Weak Kidneys Bright's Disease and Diabetes

Use Dr. Shoop's Restorative to Cure the Cause, If You Suffer From These Symptoms.

Here are the symptoms of Kidney complaints: Urine laden with sediment, brick dust in urine, highly colored urine, greasy froth or blood in it, stringy mucous in urine, unusual desire to urinate, pain in passing water, pain in the back and over the kidneys, hot, dry and itching skin, hair dry and brittle, pain in joints, legs feet or hands, heavy, sleepiness, dullness, loss of memory, weight, chilly sensations, loss of memory, grey hair, specks before the eyes, irregular heart, trouble with bowels, scanty or frequent urination, skin, fever, shooting from kidneys to one foot to the other in the back, aching, nervousness, irritation. An unusual desire to sleep or treatment is often followed by worse than none. Most Kidney medicines get their effect from diuretics. These are practically kidney phrazics, acting as cathartics by forcing the action on the bowels. They excite the kidneys to unusual action, then cause overwork. These diuretic remedies are themselves the frequent cause of serious kidney disease. Don't try to doctor the kidneys themselves, for you will only harm them. Their only strength is nerve power. Dr. Shoop's Restorative vitalizes the nerves that control the kidneys.

REMARKS FROM THE PUP.

She's taught me that I mustn't bark
At little noises after dark,
But just refrain from any fuss
Until I'm sure they're dangerous.
This would be easier, I've felt,
If noises could be seen or smelt.

She'd very wise, I have no doubt,
And pines ahead what she's about,
Yet after eating every day
She throws her nicest bones away.
If she were really less dense
She'd bury them for future use.

But that which makes me doubt the most
Those higher powers that humans boast
Is not so much a fault like that,
Nor yet her fondness for the cat,
But on our pleasant country strolls
Her dull indifference to holes!

Oh, if I once had time to spend
To reach a hole or extremest end,
I'd grab it fast, without a doubt,
And promptly dull it inside out,
Then drag it home with all my power
To chew on it in a leisure hour!

Of all the mistresses there are
Mine is the loveliest by far.
Fain would I wag myself apart
If I could thus reveal my heart.
But on some things, I must conclude,
Mine is the saner attitude.

—Burges Johnson in Harper's Magazine.

Hard to Please.

Mr. Sally—You seem worried. There's no danger.

Miss Vain—That's just it—no chance of a heroic rescue, and all the folks talking about me!

Change.

"When old Uncle Weatherby was a poor farmer he used to go up to town and eat pie with a carving fork. The people smiled."

"You don't say!"

"Then later on he began eating it with a tablespoon. The people laughed."

"I don't blame them."

"From that he changed to a knife. They roared."

"Great Scott! And is he still sticking to the knife?"

"No. Since they found oil on his farm and rated him as a millionaire he eats pie with his fingers and everybody nods his approval and says he is bizarre."—Chicago News.

On the Other Hand.

She—And do you really think you cannot live without me?

He—You want the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, I suppose?

She—Certainly.

He—Well, I can live without you, all right, if necessary, but I don't see how you can possible live without me.—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Pride.

"You need not be so critical," says the person accused. "You say I have a vinegary disposition, but every one knows that you have one too."

"I acknowledge it," retorts the accuser. "But mine is a genuine pure cider vinegar disposition, while yours is the commercial compound of sulphuric acid and water."—Woman's Home Companion.

Mental Limitations.

"Your honor," said the arrested chauffeur, "I tried to warn the man, but the horn would not work."

"Then why did you not slacken speed rather than run him down?"

Two Hairs.

"I begin to realize," said young Mr. Kallow, "that I am no longer a mere youth now that I've got a little hair on my lip."

"Yes," said Miss Knox, "and I suppose in a month or so you'll have another one."—Detroit Free Press.

One Great Advantage.

"Of what benefit to society will the discovery of the north pole be?"

"Well," answered the scientist, "for one thing it may put a stop to the loss of life and property among the explorers who want to be the first there."—Washington Star.

A Definite Proposition

If you are ailing you may take the most highly recommended pills, tinctures or elixirs, but you have no chances really of deriving any benefit. If you take FERROL, however, you take no chances; you must receive benefit, for the simple reason that FERROL contains in palatable and easily digested form the essential elements that go to the production of health, vim and energy. If you burn coal you get heat; if you take FERROL you get increased weight, strength and energy with just as great certainty.

FERROL

is phosphorized Oil and Iron. It is suitable to all seasons and all conditions. It is just as readily digested and just as much required in hot weather as in cold. It is taken with advantage to every one at every stage of life from infancy to old age.

To those who are threatened with lung trouble, who are suffering from coughs, colds, bronchitis or any kindred trouble or whose system is run down or weight impaired FERROL is a prime necessity, because it is the only preparation which can be absolutely depended upon to effect a permanent cure.

Bottle Nursing.

It is commonly supposed that nursing infants with the bottle is a modern custom, but some time ago Dr. Gottstein pointed out that that custom was widely prevalent in German cities 200 years ago, and more recently Dr. Grotjahn discovered pictorial evidence of such nursing 1,500 years ago.

The Largest Topas.

The largest topaz in the world, now in the Vatican at Rome, weighs seven pounds and has carvings upon it that occupied three Neapolitan lapidaries sixty-one years.

Around the Earth.

The time required for a journey around the earth by a man walking day and night, without resting, would be 426 days; an express train, forty days; sound at medium temperature, thirty-two and one-half hours; light, a little over one-tenth of a second, and electricity, passing through a copper wire, a little under one-tenth of a second.

The Knife in France.

The knife is a historic weapon in France. Henry III. and Henry IV. were killed with one, Louis XV. was wounded by a knife in the hands of Damiens in 1757, and it was with the knife that the Duke of Berri, an heir presumptive to the French throne, was murdered by Louvel in 1820.

National Cemeteries.

Every superintendent of a national cemetery must be an honorably discharged disabled soldier or officer of the regular or volunteer army.

Memory Bells.

Memory bells are toys peculiar to Japan and are given by Japanese youths to their sweethearts. They are constructed of slips of glass so delicately poised that the least vibration sets them jingling. The memory bells are hung in a window, where the draft will set them in motion. The delicate tinkling serves to remind their owner of the giver; hence the pretty, fanciful name.

Colored Glass.

Colored glass came from Egypt. The Egyptians carried the art to great perfection apparently before history begins to tell of it.

Queer Drinks.

Some peasants in Russia will pledge their friends in a goblet of unrefined oil, and not so long ago dwellers on the American prairies esteemed a glass of buffalo's blood the richest drink on earth.

The Mooney Baker cannot produce anything better than

Mooney's Perfection Cream Sodas

The very best of flour, butter and cream—the most modern plant, the very best baker in Canada. A biscuit superior to any other you have ever tasted. Say "Mooney's" to your grocer.

Tennis and Lawn Tennis.

There are thousands who imagine that tennis and lawn tennis are identical. In Amateur tennis, the modern game, is always known as court tennis, whereas lawn tennis is generally known as "tennis." The games are in many respects very different. The court, which in lawn tennis is open, in tennis is closed at the back and sides by the walls, and almost invariably above by a roof. There is a considerable amount of play off the back and side walls. The balls are harder than lawn tennis balls, being, in fact, of the consistency of cricket balls. Hence the rackets are heavier and the gut is thicker.—Fry's Magazine.

Songs and Sentiment.

It is a singular fact that in proportion to the wealth of melody of a nation so does its emotional side develop. Remarkable instances of this are to be found in the United Kingdom. In Scotland, Ireland and Wales, countries rich in national songs, the emotional nature is strong. In England, where the melodies, if sweet, at any rate are not so touching and appealing, sentiment is slight.

The History of Man.

The ecclesiastical authorities divide the history of man into six ages: First from Adam to Noah; second, from Noah to Abraham; third, from Abraham to David; fourth, from David to the Babylonish captivity; fifth, from the captivity of Judah to the birth of Christ; sixth, from the birth of Christ to the end of the world.

COULD SCARCELY WALK.

A RHEUMATIC SUFFERER CURED BY DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS.

Rheumatism is rooted in the blood—that is a medical fact every poor rheumatic sufferer should know. Liniments and outward applications reaches possibly cure rheumatism. They are a waste of money and while the sufferer is using them the disease is steadily growing worse. In a word but surely taking a firmer grasp upon the entire system. Rheumatism must be treated through the blood. That is the only way in which the poisonous acid can be driven out. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills actually make new blood and thus always cure rheumatism. Every dose of these pills helps to make the rich red blood which sweeps the poisonous acid from the system, loosening the aching joints and muscles and gives the rheumatic new health free from pain. Among those who can bear witness to the truth of these statements is Miss Dorsina Langlois of St. Jerome, Que., for months she suffered from rheumatism and found that she could scarcely walk. "I could not straighten up" said Miss Langlois "and the pains were almost useless, so stiff were they. For many months I wounded by a knife in the hands of suffered as much pain as only rheumatic sufferers can understand. A though I had forty years of age the rheumatism I endured actually made me look like an old woman. I used liniments and tried several medicines but got no relief. I was getting worse instead of better when by chance my attention was directed to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I began taking them and in the course of a few weeks I could see they were helping me. Little by little the pain began to go, and the stiffness in my joints. I continued taking the pills for several months and every symptom of the trouble had disappeared. I have not felt a twinge of rheumatism since and I bless the day Dr. Williams' Pink Pills came to my notice."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills never fail to cure rheumatism because they go right to the root of the trouble in the blood. That is why these pills cure all the common ailments due to poor and watery blood, such as anaemia, headaches and backaches, indigestion, neuralgia, St. Vitus' dance, general weakness, and the distressing irregularities which afflict women and growing girls. If you need a medicine you will have no better than Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for pale people. See that the full name "Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People" is printed on the wrapped around each box. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Old Whist Terms.

The following passage is from the Adventurer, No. 35, March 6, 1753:

"On Sunday last a terrible fire broke out in Long Reag's, occasioned by the following accident: Mrs. Overall, the housekeeper, having lost three rubbers at whist running without halting, swabbed on that notwithstanding she had changed chairs, fursed the cards and ordered Jemmy, the footboy, to sit cross legged for good luck, grew out of all pattience and, taking up the devil's sooks, as she called them, flung them into the fire, and the flames spread to the steward's room."

Swabbers are the ace of hearts, the knave of clubs and the ace and the deuce of trumps at whist. To fursa a fuss is to shuffle the cards very carefully or to change the pack.—London Notes and Queries.

Why Rain Clouds Are Black.

The color of a cloud depends on the manner in which the sunlight falls upon it and the position of the observer. It will be noticed that high clouds are always white or light in color, and this is because the bright rays of the sun are seen is reflected from the under surfaces by the numberless drops of moisture which go to form the cloud. Heavy rain clouds, on the other hand, are found much nearer the earth, and so the light falls on them more directly from above, giving a dull appearance. The reflected from the undersurface appears black owing to the complete reflection and absorption of the light by the upper layers. When rain clouds appear as an observer in a balloon, the blackest rain clouds appear of the most dazzling ly brilliant white.

When children are pale, peevish and restless at night they require a dose or two of Mother's Worm Powder. For sale at The Medical Hall.—Fred L. Hooper.

Bleeding Piles Cured after Years of Suffering.

Mistakenly may be cut—but the day of curing people from suffering is ever-present. What is more distressing than Itching, Bleeding Piles? Some say the only cure is the knife. We say, operations are unnecessary. Read this letter:

"For years I had Piles, which protruded and bled freely. The itching pain was sometimes almost unbearable. Often I suffered so severely it was next to impossible to remain on duty. It was a horrible to walk. I tried many remedies, but with poor success. "This winter, the first I was out of the Bench Shows— I suffered greatly—was almost compelled to remain in my room. I tried almost everything—got little relief.

"On my return home, Mira Ointment was advised. I used it. In only a short time, all the irritation and pain ceased. I can now walk with ease and attend my duties as a member of the Fire Department.

"I strongly recommend Mira Ointment to everyone suffering from this annoying complaint."

Stammer to Yourself.

To the many correspondents who have written asking for suggestions as to a cure for stammering we may state that this is not a medical book. This writer gave his own method of curing his own particular nervous disorder, which is probably shared by many of his fellow men. Let it be repeated in answer to many who wish to have seen the problem and missed the solution. Consume your own smoke. If you must stammer, try to stammer to yourself. When you have tut-tutted and gur-gurred sufficiently to yourself, you will be ready for the world. It is quite astonishing how soon the befuddled stammer becomes unnecessary and the word is whipped out! But there are some men who hug it to their bosoms as a sign of wealth in the right place—biting curiosity to tiptoe in the listener. Charles Lamb stammered, but always in the right place, as who would want to be cheated (the story may be quite untrue). The shopman offered to send it home. "Impossible," said he, "I could not carry it myself," he said, "I could not carry it home."—London Spectator.

—Mr. Herbert Sager returned to town last week with his pony-gymnast, after a successful season's business in the east. He is at present located on the site of the old skating rink.

—Mr James Kenny brought ninety-two cattle, yearlings and two-year-olds. Herfords and Durhams from the east this week, for wintering. They are the finest lot ever seen in this section.

—An error was made in the prize list last week of Ernestown Agricultural show. The winners of Rennie's special prizes were: 1st, Lillian Aylesworth; 2d, R. W. Aylsworth; 3d, J. C. Johnston.

—The Napanee Curling Club will proceed at once to clear away the old building in front of the rink, and will erect a comfortable reception room in its place, with large windows looking on the rink.

—The new law respecting use of nets in Bay of Quinte will affect the catch of whitefish this fall. The fish go up the bay to spawn and the fishermen are not allowed to set their nets past the Upper Gap.

—The concert given by the Bateman-Parlovitz Concert Party, in the opera house on Tuesday evening, was first-class in every respect, and was greeted by a full house. Those instrumental in bringing this high class company to Napanee are entitled to the thanks of a music loving public.

—Squire Clarke, of Ernestown, near Collins Bay, was sixty-five years married on 12th Oct. just passed. MORE PEOPLE THAN EVER
ARE BUYING AT ROBINSON'S.

The increase in business of The Robinson Co. Store in 1906 over and above the business done in 1905 will be in itself as much as many a store does in the whole year; and that is the way this store has been growing for the last ten years—each year holding the gains of former years and piling on such an enormous increase. It isn't luck or personal popularity or location, but it is because

THE ROBINSON STORE GIVES BEST SERVICE,

Best variety of goods, best in showing desirable things that other stores haven't; best in courteous treatment; best in liberality of guarantee; best because charging least price. We've larger forces than ever; we've increased facilities and we're almost too busy some days. Did ever a store in Napanee grow so—or serve so?

FUR JACKETS—The cold weather last week must have brought the Fur question very seriously before you. Perhaps you have not been giving much thought to this line. We have been doing the thinking and selecting for you, and all you have to do now is to come to us to get just what you want. Our stock is fresh and clean, all new styles and positively the best values to be had.

ASTRACHAN JACKETS are shown in Plain Fronts, Blouse Fronts, with and without Coon Sable or Alaska Sable trimmings. There is no better Jacket offered for a driving jacket than these, at from $20.00 to $60.00.

For street Jackets the ELECTRIC SEAL with blouse front, about 24 inches long, made of all Seal, or trimmed with Sable, Sable Coon or Muskrat, makes a very rich appearing garment.

We have placed in stock a full range of GENUINE FRENCH and BALTIC SEAL JACKETS. For looks and durability they can't be equalled at $50.00.

Made in blouse front. Also made trimmed with blended Muskrat at $60.00.

THE MUSKRAT JACKET is coming more prominently into use every season. In appearance this coat is away better than a Coon coat, and for real hard wear it is a sure thing to buy.

We could write a book about our PERSIAN JACKETS. It will do you good just to have a look at these garments. There are few city stores that could show you anything like the range, and our prices are right.

"XMAS IS COMING."

NEW READY TO USE CARPETS AND RUGS.

We just received from the old country another shipment of Carpets and Rugs. That "shippy" odor taken on in the ocean trip has not left them yet. If first choice and wealth of variety means anything to you by all means see these new arrivals.

ENGLISH VELVET RUGS—Woven in one solid piece. Rich deep pile, good to wear, 3 yds. x 3 1-2, $19.50, 3 yds x 4 yds, 22.50, 3 1-2 yds x 4 yds., 25.00.

ENGLISH TAPESTRY RUGS—We wish to impress upon you that these are English Rugs because all Tapestry Rugs are not English made and some makes of Tapestry are not so reliable. Price is no more than the ordinary sorts, 3 yds x 3 1-2 yds are 8.50, 3 yds x 4 yds are 10.00, 3 1-2 x 4 yds are 12.50, and 3 1-2 x 4 1-2 yds are only 14 50.

HIGH GRADE WILTON—If you would like to see a very handsome carpet ask to see our newest arrivals in Wilton carpets. The design is very pleasing and worked out beautifully on two shades of green, border to match, $2.00 yd.

AN ENGLISH AXMINSTER—Worked out in a beautiful design on a beze ground shading to fawn and wood, body and border, $1.50 yd.

Any person requiring Carpets and House Furnishings of any kind do themselves an injustice if they overlook seeing what we show this season. We will be more than pleased to compare samples with any city house in Canada. During the week we were compared with B— K— & P—. We got the orders.

FREE CORSET DEMONSTRATION STILL GOING ON.

Miss McClelland is still with us for to-day and to-morrow, giving a free demonstration and fitting of the famous B. and L. bias filled Corsets. Whether you wish to buy corsets now or no we would like to have all our customers consult Miss McClelland while she is here. There are lots of people spoiling their health and figure with ill fitting corsets. This expert service is here for the asking. Use it. No obligation to buy.

"There are two ways of spending a dollar—you can spend it at home, gain an easy conscience, make another friend and perhaps get the dollar back to-morrow, or you send it away, feel that you have sinned against your town, and forever lose the dollar and the influence for good to yourself and neighbor."

OUR WOMEN'S READY-TO-WEAR DEPARTMENT.

Saturday was a record for this section. Skirts, Waists, Jackets for Women and Children, Costumes, etc., were bought right and left just as fast as we could handle them. To buy early in season is becoming more popular. Those who buy now have a full season's wear ahead and all the advantage of early choice. I et us sl ow you now before any sizes are missing.

Baby Coats, More White Bearskin Coats for the Tots, from $1.50 to $4.75.

Women's Rain and Utility Coats.

It is not an expense to spend a few dollars in a Rain or Utility Coat. They pay for themselves in the way they save looks of fine dresses. Good choosing from $5.00 to $15.00.

Our Flanael, Flannelette and Wrapperette Stock is Complete.

In prices, quality and patterns we can satisfy the most particular As a sample of our values we would call your attention to our ten-cent line in light and dark stripes, 36 in. wide. These goods are usually sold at 12 1-2 cts. yd.

LINENS, LINENS, LINENS.

Every person is interested in linens, especially coming on the holiday season of the year. You may need a new cloth, your table napkins may show the wear and tear of the tub, or your centre piece may be wanting. Our stock is complete and all lovers of high class table ware would do well to inspect our stock whether wanting at the present or the near future. About a month ago we received our annual shipment of Hand Embroidered Table ware direct from Ireland, whicli consists of Tea Cloths, size 36 in. x 36 in and 60 in. x 60 in.

Tray Cloths and Carvers, 20 in x 30 in., 18 in. x 27 in., round or square.
Centre Pieces, 18x18, 24x24, round or square.
Sideboard Scarfs, 18x24.
Doylies, all sizes from 6 in x 6 in and 9 in x 9 in, the small finger doylies, up to the large doylies 18x18 and 36x36, suitable for 5 o'clock teas.
Bed Spreads with Shams to match.

We also have in stock Japanese Hand Embroidered Linen Sets consisting of Cloth 36 in x 36 in or 40 in x 40 in, Carvers 18 in x 27 in., and Centre Piece 18x24. All embroidered in the same design. A visit to our linen department will surely repay you. Then we have, providing nothing in stock satisfies the particular buyer, a system at our fingers ends by which a person can have embroidered to order in a design of their own selecting. Bedspreads with Shams, Dresser Cover and Wash stand Cover to match.

"Xmas is Coming."

MEN'S CLOTHING

Dependable because correct. Dependable because made well.

The big manufacturing tailors who are our suppliers keep one hand on the pulse of men's fashions and the other on their output. We are also close watchers of men's styles. Get the suit or overcoat in the style that you look best in. Clothed from the Robinson stock you will be correctly garbed.

Men's Overcoats from $5 to $18.50, winter.
Men's Raincoats from $7.50 to $12.50—Correct style.
Men's Single and Double Breasted Suits, $6.00 to $17.50.

NEXT WEEK'S BARGAIN.

BOY'S SUITS, sizes 28 to 33, twenty-five of them, regular prices $3.75 to $5 00, your choice for $3 each.

SATURDAY NIGHT SPECIAL IN OUR MEN'S STORE.

Just to make it interesting for Saturday night, Oct. 20th, only, we will place on sale our 50c Neckwear at 39c each and our 25c Neckwear at 18c each. Come in and see us on Saturday night. You will be pleased.

MERCHANT TAILORING.

$20.00 SACK SUITS $17.50.

Next week we will take orders for twenty men's suits at a saving of $2.50. These are our regular goods in our best tailored style. Why the saving? We want more men to know our Merchant Tailoring. We consider that every suit sold is a standing advertisement that is good as long as the suit lasts.

Single or Double Breasted. No extra charge for double breasted sack. Every detail of our ordered suits is guaranteed as is also the fit. Materials are this season's best styles, plaids, overplaids, checks and stripes. Give us all the time you can in reason for making them up.

MEN'S CARDIGAN JACKETS.

Often a Cardigan Jacket worn under the regular coat is sufficient, without an Overcoat, and very much handier to those who as drivers for example have to be active in outdoor pursuits. Cardigan Jackets from 75c up to $2.50. Fancy Cardigan Vests, very pretty and warm too, $1.75 up to $3.50 each.

THE BRIDAL EVE

BY MRS. E. D. E. N. SOUTHWORTH

Author of
"Ishmael," etc.

post chaise at the door in half an hour," was the brief order of Colonel Hastings.

"Yes, your honor. What would your honor like for breakfast?"

"Anything that is at hand, only be quick."

The landlord bowed and disappeared, and was soon succeeded by the head waiter, who came in and laid the cloth and spread upon the table a most substantial breakfast, to which the hungry travelers did ample justice.

They had scarcely finished the meal before the post chaise was announced.

The elder Hastings arose, saying:

"Albert, my boy, I am sorry that etiquette does not admit of your waiting upon your belle maitresse to-day, by seeing her unto you sweet self at the church. But au revoir until to-morrow at twelve."

And with this abrupt leave-taking, the elder Hastings, attended by his secretary, Cassinove, left the house, and entered the post chaise to drive to Swinburne Castle.

A drive of more than a mile brought them to Swinburne park church, an ancient, ivy-covered, Gothic edifice, near which the castle itself, and, like it, castle, celebrated in History, in story, and in song. There rested the remains of the many generations of the ancient Barons of Swinburne, from the time of the conquest down to the death of Sir Harold Etheridge, who died only five years before, leaving his only daughter, sole heiress of all his possessions.

They drove rapidly on, for yet another mile, along the boundary of the park, and suddenly came upon a thicket of trees, from the midst of which frowned the ruins of the ancient but solid masonry now covered thickly with ivy. Young Cassinove, who felt a deep interest in all that concerned the old home, paused to contemplate this venerable ruin, but again the impatience of his employer signified the need to hasten to greater speed, and they drove hurriedly past. A few yards farther on they reached the grand gate of the park, guarded by the ancient porter's lodge.

They passed under the lofty archway, and entered upon the beautiful grounds that lay more immediately around the castle.

Swinburne Castle was of later date than the ancient keep, the ruins of which they had just passed, and from which it took its name. The building was a double quadrangle, with the front of the letter H, and having towers at the four extremities.

Behind the castle arose the thick, impenetrable woods bordering the open chase, before it lay a smiling, landscape diversified by groves of flowers, groves of beautiful trees, and a small, clear lake, shaded by overhanging willows, and adorned by a flock of graceful white swans.

An exclamation of delight broke from the lips of Cassinove as his eye fell upon this scene of exceeding beauty, now lighted up as it was by the glorious sun of June.

They drew up before the central transept that connected the two long wings of the castle.

Two grooms, in waiting without, immediately came forward to attend to the Hastings, who alighted, followed by his secretary. One of the grooms dismissed the post chaise, while the other knocked at the door, which was immediately opened by a footman in the gray and white livery of Lady Etheridge of Swinburne.

"Show me into the library, Williams, and let her ladyship know of my arrival for her convenience. Cassinove, my good fellow, you can stay here, I suppose, until you are wanted," said Colonel Hastings, opening a door on his right to admit the young secretary into a sitting-room, and then going on, as attended by the footman, to the library.

The apartment into which young Cassinove had been shown was a pleasant, cheerful morning room, simply but elegantly furnished. The great front window, reaching from ceiling to floor, and from side to side, commanded an expansive view of the lawn, with its groups of trees, its shaded lake, and its parterres of flowers. A rosery outside the window adorned the entrance, while shortening the view of this small picture was the opposite end of the room, which was occupied by that filled up all that part of the wall, and reflected the whole of the landscape encompassed by the window.

While Cassinove stood before the mirror, enjoying the reflected landscape suddenly among the trees glided a purple-draped female figure, that immediately riveted his attention. It was a woman in the earliest bloom of youth. Her form was above the medium height, and well rounded. Her head was finely formed, and covered with a profusion of jet-black, glittering hair, that was plainly parted on her broad, expansive forehead, and swept around the temples, and wound into a rich and massive knot at the back of the head. Her eyes were large, luminous, dark-gray orbs, that seemed, whenever the long veil of lashes was lifted, to throw a light wherever they glanced.

The impression made upon the enthusiastic heart of Ferdinand Cassinove was at once vivid, deep, and strong—quick as sun-painting, permanent as sculpture. He saw this goddess of intellectual brow and stately step open the window and advance into the room, and as she approached him he felt his whole frame thrill with a strange emotion of blended pain and delight. He dreaded to move, yet, as the needle turns to the magnet, he felt himself turning from the reflected image to face the original. He stood before that stately form, that deep, dark, large, luminous, dark eyes fixed upon him in royal graciousness, as she said:

"You are Colonel Hastings' secretary, I believe, sir. Pray sit down. You will find the London papers on that table." And, with a graceful bow, the lady passed him, and seated herself on a sofa at the extremity of the room, took up a portfolio, and was soon busily engaged with its contents.

After the profound bow with which he had returned her curtsey, Ferdinand Cassinove remained motionless where she had left him. But many minutes had elapsed since she had glided in among the flowers, and passed him like a vision seen in some beautiful dream. But ten minutes, and life, the world, himself, were all changed for Ferdinand Cassinove. He felt, from that moment, that his fate must take its character for good or evil from the will of that royal-looking woman.

Who was she? What was she?

He had heard that Lady Etheridge had a young friend, Miss Dorsten, staying with her, to act as her first attendant at the approaching marriage. That friend was Miss Dorsten. And she who was Ferdinand Cassinove, that he dared to occupy his thoughts with Miss Dorsten? A young man of obscure origin, left to the benevolent guardianship of Colonel Hastings, who had defrayed the expenses of his education at school and college, and afterward taken him into his family as his private secretary. All of Lady's genius and poetry smoldered in the heart of the young secretary, and there were kindled into a sudden blaze by the electric spark of love.

Miss Dorsten, a lady of rank, and, perhaps, of fortune! Oh, if she were not already wooed and won! Give him time and, under the inspiration of his love for her, he would win wealth; distinction, a glorious name, and lay them at her feet. His passion was now sudden as it was ardent, remember that Ferdinand Cassinove was of the Celtic race. Yes, he would win the world, and lay it at her feet!

In the midst of the pleasing pals of this love-dream the door opened, and the gray-haired servant whom Ferdinand had seen in the park entered softly, and stepping across the room to where the lady sat, and speaking in the low, subdued tone in which royal personages are addressed, said:

"My lady, Colonel Hastings' respects, and he awaits your ladyship in the library."

"Very well, William," replied the lady, closing the portfolio that she had been examining, and rising. "I will attend him immediately," answered the lady, rising.

This queenly woman, then, was Laura, Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne, and she was indeed quite unattainable by him! Oh, despair! His castle in the air tumbled all about him, and buried all his hopes in its ruins. Love's fire was fairly before, leaving his only possessions a cold, barren, and stored with the literature of all lands and ages, and adorned with the portraits of many of the old barons of Swinburne as had been distinguished in the councils or the battles of their nation. At writing-table near the centre sat Colonel Hastings, who arose with the stately courtesy of the olden time, and gave a chair for the lady.

Lady Etheridge, after greeting her guardian cordially, took the indicated seat.

The old servant retired.

Ferdinand Cassinove withdrew to a distant table and, with eyes of stained glass, and stood apparently studying its scriptural subjects, but really with preternaturally sharpened by the excitement of his heart and brain, compelled to hear every word that passed at that central table.

There they sat, the guardian and his ward, the one in the prime of manhood, with his tall, spare figure, and thin, pale face, in marked contrast with the slight proportions and delicate beauty of the latter in all their perfection.

"Just what it likes, my dear guardian. I am of age and have the right to do what I please with my own. I please to bestow it all, not only in effect, but in reality, upon my husband," she repeated, with a low, sweet laugh.

"But, Lady Etheridge, I do not know that you, the last baroness of the ancient house of Swinburne, have the right to transfer the Castle of Swinburne, with its vast dependence, to an alien."

"An alien! Do you call my husband an alien?"

"He is not of your blood."

"He is more. He is of my heart, and soul, and spirit by the law of love," said Colonel Hastings' there can be no question of mine and thine between me and Albert. From the deed of gift that transfers all my possessions to my future husband is made out; let it be executed. He shall not receive never be jealous of his wife's riches, for she will come to him as poor as a cottage girl," exclaimed Lady Etheridge, with that devotion of love flushing her cheek and lighting her eyes.

"Lady Etheridge, are you resolved upon this transfer?"

"Immutably."

"Then you must have your will. Cassinove, come hither, if you please. Your signature is wanted, as witness to a deed."

Young Cassinove started. He had heard all that had passed; thinking—feeling—Oh, Heavens! how this woman can love—this woman, whom I could worship, say, whom I shall worship as the guiding star of my life, as long as I shall live. Oh, that the man who is blessed with her love may be worthy of her! And, oh, that I had the old Pagan privilege of opening the breast of that bad rascal, its tortures! He obeyed Colonel Hastings' summons, and went up to the table where he was presented to Lady Etheridge, as

"My secretary, Mr. Cassinove, your ladyship."

"I have seen Mr. Cassinove before," said the lady, kindly holding out her hand.

He barely touched the white hand as he bent before her. His own turned cold as ice.

"Now, then, Lady Etheridge," exclaimed Colonel Hastings, spreading out the document before her.

And the business of signing and witnessing the deed was completed.

Colonel Hastings and his secretary then took leave, and left the castle to return to the Etheridge Arms, whither we must precede them by a few hours.

CHAPTER II.

Colonel Hastings had scarcely left the room ere Mr. Albert Hastings arose, stretched himself with a weary yawn, and began to pace thoughtfully up and down the floor, murmuring:

"Men think me a very fortunate and happy man; and, doubtless, an unusual number of good gifts have been conferred upon me by the favor of the blind goddess—not the least among which would be esteemed the hand of this wealthy young baroness, my bride expectant. Well, I cannot have a reason to be want in this world, else sweet Rose Elmer only should be the theme of my thoughts. Rose, the lovely little dreams that the man who has wooed her, under the name of William Lovel, is only Albert Hastings, the envied bridegroom of the high-born Lady Etheridge of Swinburne. It cannot be helped. I cannot pause for duty's right, or maiden's honor. Here, then, for a divided life; my hand to the lady of Swinburne—my heart to the lovely cottage girl; only Lady Etheridge must never know of Rose Elmer, and William Lovel, nor must Rose Elmer know Lady Etheridge and Albert Hastings. And now to persuade Rose to go before me into Wales, where myself and my lady-bride are to spend our honeymoon."

And so saying, Albert Hastings took his hat and strolled out into the street. Making for the nearest cottage, and that taken by Colonel Hastings in his drive to Swinburne Castle, Albert Hastings soon reached the cross-country road, which he pursued for about two miles. Then, turning to the left, he entered a narrow lane, that led him to a small, secluded cottage, nearly hidden from the road by tall hedgerows, clustering shrubs and overhanging trees. Taking a key from his pocket, he unfastened the little garden gate, and passing between tall, flowering shrubs, he stepped under the vine-shaded porch of the cottage. In a small key, opened the cottage door and entered at once upon the only large room that the cottage could boast.

This lonely cottage had been rented and furnished by Albert Hastings as a trysting place for his love. The whole air of the room was couleur de rose. He called it "my bower." Every flower, indeed, the bower of one peerless rose. Here he had been accustomed, during his visits to Swinburne Castle, to leave his affianced bride, to meet the Rose of his secret thoughts. But here, also, he had to be constantly on his guard, to expected the honor of the humble maiden—not upon any good principle, perhaps, but from the fear of the conqueror of his selfish heart, and resolved upon making her his own forever, and obtained from any feeling on her part alarm her delicacy, and, perhaps, estrange her heart.

Albert Hastings, the only son of Colonel Hastings, of Hastings Hall, Devon, one of the wealthiest men who had been endowed by nature with many other good gifts besides his prominently handsome and princely person. He had a good head, and originally a good heart; but he had been spoiled from his youth upward by a fond belief that the whole world, and all within it, had been created for his own private use and profit. The consequence of this selfish creed were not now fully credited, it was, at least, thoroughly practiced by him in practice—a thing that cannot often be said of better creeds, or even better men.

Albert Hastings had always been deeply enamored of Rose Elmer, but, as he only be distressed at the supposed hallucination of your old nurse; therefore, as yet, I shall only call you by the name to which you have been accustomed."

The baroness could only look and listen intently, being unable to conjecture to what the strange words of the woman tended, if, indeed, they tended to anything.

"Lady Etheridge, what sort of an education have you received?—oh, I do not mean as to the polite branches, for I know well that you have had all sorts of masters and mistresses for these—but as to the education of the heart, every art and science that is deemed necessary to the training of a young lady of quality—but I mean to ask you have you received the education that befits, that strengthens, that prepares you to meet trial, sorrow, and adversity; for these are the lot of all; the sooner or later come to every one, even to you, who are styled the Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne?"

And here the woman paused, fixing her wild, mournful eyes intently upon the face of the baroness.

"There is something behind your words, woman," said Lady Etheridge. "What is it you have to tell me I cannot imagine."

"I have a story to tell you, Lady Etheridge, and I had best begin at the beginning; but first pour me a little wine from that t-ttle on the chimneypiece."

Lady Etheridge complied, and when Magdalene Elmer had drunk off a small full, she drew a deep breath, and commenced her story.

"Lady Etheridge, my father was the game-keeper at Swinburne Chase, as his father, and grandfather had been before him. Our family name was Coke. When I was about seventeen years of age, my mother died, leaving me the only lovely little sister, about ten years old. I became the housekeeper, my father, and it was mother of my little sister May. William Etheridge, the late baron, was then about forty own years old; he had not come to his title, as his bachelor uncle was still living. The young gentleman spent all the holidays at Swinburne Castle, and, during the season employed his time largely in woodland and field sports. He was often with my father and the under game-keepers. And he was also a frequent visitor at our lodge in the woods when there was no one present to prevent his talking nonsense to 'the game-keeper's pretty daughter,' as I was called. And nonsense, and nothing but nonsense it was; at any rate, on my part, for I was but seventeen. Do not shrink from me, Lady Etheridge. My affections were soon—oh! my honor! And I, foolish creature, believed all his vows sincere, because when he made them he was really in earnest. The spoiled and inexperienced boy believed what he said, when he swore solemnly that he never could love any other woman but me, and that he would marry me as soon as he came of age. Then he went abroad.

"At length the youth took leave of us and went to Oxford. When he returned he still called me his 'Maggy,' but he jested about our childish love. And I, who had grown older, began to understand how impossible it was that the future Baron Etheridge, of Swinburne, could ever marry his gamekeeper's daughter, and I bore no malice against this young Oxonian, but I retained in my heart a kindly affection for my own lover, as though he had been a creature altogether separate and distant from the fine young squire. And so in my thoughts I separated them still. Well, he went away again, and I saw him no more for two years, for the next vacation he spent with some friends. In the meantime my young sister grew up a beautiful creature as ever bloomed into womanhood. She had a small and graceful form, delicate features, complexion of the purest white and red, glittering black hair, splendid black eyes, and an ever-varying, most enchanting smile. I was twenty-five, and my sister eighteen, when the young squire came to the castle to pay us a last visit, previous to departing for his tour on the Continent. I never had seen him so handsome and fascinating as he was then. Still I never thought of him except as the young master, and never associated him with the memory of my love; but during the few weeks of his stay he came frequently to our lodge, and always seemed affectionate to me. I used to do all the shopping and marketing for our little household, and often returning from these errands in the village, I found Mr. Etheridge in company with my fair young sister. From these occurrences he would always spring forward and greet me most affectionately, exclaiming:

"'I have been waiting for you, Maggy,' or words to that effect.

"Heaven knows that I never had a doubt of his honor, or a fear for my sister's heart. I had known the young squire from his childhood, and I knew we had once been sincere lovers, he had never done, or said, a single thing to wound my delicate sensibilities, how could I suspect that his visits boded evil to my May? Alas! I did not know how much besides classics and mathematics he had learned at Oxford; no, nor how the world had changed him! I was blind, deaf, senseless to all misgivings. At length the last day of his visit came. The next morning he was to start upon his tour. That night my sister clung to me and wept all night. I could not comfort her. She answered my questions in broken sobs, and I set it all down to nervousness, never for an instant connecting her malady with the thought of the young squire's departure. The next morning he took leave of us and went away; alone as we thought. That night my May was missing. Ah! I cannot enter upon the details of this sad story. A few days of agonising and fruitless search, and then we ascertained that she was the companion of his flight. He had waited for her at a neighboring post-town, where, according to their previous arrangements, she had joined him. My father was an old man, in feeble health; he never recovered the shock. The baron was in a terrible rage, and swore that he would never forgive or speak to his son again. He did all he could for my father, retained him in his service at full wages, and hired a young gamekeeper Elmer, to do his duty in the Chase. I must hurry over this part of my story. Within twelve months after the flight of May my father died. I married John Elmer, and he succeeded to the situation of headkeeper. Soon after we got news of Maggy the lodge. It was in the second year of our marriage that we got news of Maggy. He had deserted her, broken her heart, and she was dead—dead, and in a foreign grave! It was then that I registered an oath in heaven to avenge upon the head of her destroyer the evils and death of my only sister. And to do this the more effectually, I resolved to conceal the fiery hatred that consumed my heart.

"Another year passed. The old baron died, and the young one reigned in his stead.

"I would fain have persuaded my husband to throw up his situation, rather than serve a master who had wrought us such bitter wrong. But John Elmer was obstinate, was ambitious, and I buried the bitter hatred in my breast—and blced my time.

"I say so in other days, when the new baron wooed and won a young and beautiful bride. She was a delicate creature, fair-skinned, blue-eyed, golden-haired—too fragile for the cares of this world, where, indeed, she did not tarry long. It was some fifteen months after her marriage that she died, leaving an infant daughter only a few days old. Her early death was a righteous judgment on him, the traitor!"

"My mother! my sweet mother, who perished in her early youth! Oh, nurse, how can you say such things of her!"

"Peace, Lady Etheridge, until you hear the rest—it is not much. The new baroness was likely to perish for the want of a nursing mother. I was then nursing my own child, which was but three weeks old. My husband was down with the mortal illness that finally terminated in death. The housekeeper at the castle recommended that the child should be placed in my charge. I was installed as your nurse within the infant, but only on condition that it should be sent to my cottage and be in my sole care. To this his lordship consented.

"He went away. And then I laid the babes side by side in the solitude of my room, and looked at them. Young infants as they were, they were much alike. My own child and my master's were both of the same age and sex, and both fair-haired, fair-skinned, red-ed, almond-eyed babies, with no more individuality to distinguish one from the other than two drops of the same pattern.

"There, in the solitude of my cottage, I changed the clothing of those children. And three months afterward, when his lordship came home, it was my daughter whom I carried up to the castle to be caressed and fondled, and it was my own child who lived for a week carried in state to the family chapel and christened by a Lord Bishop, and received into the bosom of her father, and there the purpose, I was my daughter who had servants, and tutors, and governesses to attend to her day and night. It was my daughter who was brought up with the state of a young princess, finally. It was my daughter, who, at the death of the baron, entered into his inheritance as Lady, Baroness Etheridge, of Swinburne!" exclaimed the weird creature, her eyes gleaming with triumph, as if even she felt the wild virulent stimulus of hatred, and tasted the poisoned sweetness of revenge!"

"My God! my God! Oh, woman, woman!—for I cannot call you mother —what is this that you have done!" moaned the lady, dropping her head upon her clasped hands.

"I have consummated my revenge on—"

Lady Etheridge shuddered and shrank away from her.

"I have filled my life with remorse for—"

Lady Etheridge again shuddered.

"And I have lost my immortal soul! Laura, no longer Baroness Etheridge—Laura, my daughter, speak to me, I am dying!"

"Oh, mother! mother! mother! mother!" exclaimed she who was no longer Lady Etheridge, as she dropped upon her knees by the bedside, and buried her face in the coverlet.

"Laura! from this hour I will comfort me! I am dying! Laura, you, at least have no reason to complain! You have gained by the exchange! You have received the education of a gentlewoman; you should not blame me!"

"Mother, mother, I do not presume to do so; but, oh! the bitterness of the crime. Repent of it! repent of it! pray God for forgiveness!" sobbed Laura.

"Repent! pray! I cannot! I can go no further," replied the woman, gloomily.

"Ah! my mother, to undo what you have done—to right this wrong, will be more difficult than you think; for though I shall immediately yield up my possession of the castle and estates that I have so long considered my own, yet, believe me, it will be difficult to convince the House of Peers, before whom this matter must come, that the nameless girl whom you deprived of the title has any right thereunto."

"Ah! here is that all. There are other proofs. The links in the chain of evidence will all be found complete."

"It is better that it be so; since a question as to the true inheritrix must be raised. I am glad that the secret is susceptible of proof which will place the matter at rest forever. And now, my mother, you are not dying, nor even near death, as your fears would suggest. You must permit me to return to the castle, and take certain arrangements that must not be delayed. I will return to you immediately afterward," said Laura, rising, and arranging her disordered dress.

In their long interview, the night unheeded had passed away, and brought the morning.

When Laura opened the door, the first rays of the rising sun streamed into the room. The carriage still waited before the door, and the coachman was asleep on the box.

"Wilson," said the lady, "I am really sorry to have kept you all night with a sick woman, while I watched by a sick bed. You shall go to sleep when you get back to the castle; but now I have business that will not admit of delay. Then return hither to take me home."

The man touched his forehead, and, gathering up his reins, drove off. The lady returned to the house, and set about making her preparations for leaving woman, to wait until the carriage came back.

She was put by the shock of her sudden fall, distressed by doubts of the reality of her own position, and of the stability of her own reason, tempted to believe the events of the night only the phantasmagoria of a feverish dream, and feeling, through all this chaos of thought, the imminent necessity of immediate action, Laura waited until, almost at the same moment the carriage drove up to the door, Rose, with the neighbor at whose house she had spent the night, came in.

Making a sign to them that her patient was asleep, Laura Elmer arose to leave the house; but first she turned to gaze on Rose, the unconscious, though rightful Baroness Etheridge. Since the preceding night, fearful change had passed over the face of the maiden. Her cheeks were the pale as this world, where, indeed, she did not tarry long. It was some fifteen months after her marriage that she died, leaving an infant daughter only a few days old. Her early death was a righteous judgment on him, the traitor!"

of the bed, the sleeping woman awoke, and seeing her, said:

"Ah, you have returned, as you promised! I knew you would, Laura! Laura! take my hand, my child. Forget your past grandeur, or regard it only as a brilliant dream, and take my hand, my child. I will not ask it long. Are we alone?"

"No, mother: Rose is here, and one of your neighbors."

"Send them away."

Laura arose and spoke to Rose and to the neighbor, both of whom immediately left the house. Then she returned to the bedside of her mother-in-law, who again eagerly clasped and held her hand, saying:

"Oh, Laura! Laura! do not feel coldly toward me. Let me have the comfort of my child's affection in the last few hours of my life. Oh, Laura! Laura! all these years my heart has yearned to you with such a mighty, unquenchable thirst for your presence and your love; and when I have heard all the people praise the goodness and wisdom, and bounty of Lady Etheridge, I have said to myself: That is my daughter. So haughty, cold-blooded and selfish Etheridge ever was good, wise or bountiful. It is because she is my daughter!' and when I have seen you passing through the village in state and grandeur, and joy, I have not dared to linger and gaze upon you there, lest I should rush out and catch you to my bosom. Do not be cold to me now; indeed, it would break my heart, and cut short even the few hours I have to live. Do not shrink from me now, my only child!" pleaded the woman, in a voice of such deep sorrow that Lady Etheridge bent down and tenderly kissed her, saying:

"I do not, mother. I have come to stay with you till the last."

"Oh, thank you, Laura!" cried the wretched woman, pressing her hand with spasmodic hastle. "And you forgive—"

"Poor mother! Forgiveness is a profane word to pass from child to parent."

"Yet I cannot rest without it, Laura."

"Then take it, with all my heart. If you think that you have injured me in the meaning of this? It seems to me that to-day I have stepped into a train of strange adventures."

"Not so strange, either, as those you had marked out for yourself when you proposed, in the same day, to marry a peeress and a peasant, and plot against which of the two did you meditate the blackest treachery? Against the outlawed lady whom you were about to lead to the altar, or the ill-loved cottage!, whom you were alarming to destruction? Tell me, Laura! what blackness of wickedness! Stand out of my way, sir, and let me pass. Your presence was not pleasing to my shine to me!" exclaimed the maiden, with a horror so real that it could not have been assumed.

"Rose! I have twice asked you what is the meaning of this attack. I have a right to an answer."

"You shall have it, Mr. Hastings. But first, you tell me that you have not heard it is, that on this, your wedding day, and hour, you are here, questioning me, instead of being at the church with Lady Etheridge?"

He saw, by her manner and her expression, that it was now too much for him to attempt to carry on the deception. He felt no other course was possible for him but to tell the truth, and defend his conduct as best he might. He said:

"Rose, it is true that many months before I knew you and love, partly to please my father, who desired a marriage, and partly to please the lady who conferred upon me the honor of her preference, I proposed to marry Lady Etheridge, without a particle of love on my side entering into the affair. After meeting you, I found out my world, and loved you, the first and only woman I ever did love, the last and only woman I ever can love. I could not forego the pleasure of seeking your dear presence, and beseeching your love. If I appeared to you under an assumed name, it was a lover's extravagance, and as such, you may pardon it. I love you, Rose, with a whole and undivided heart. In proof of which, I have this day done what I should have done months ago. I have broken with Lady Etheridge, and I have come hither to throw myself upon your mercy, a long confession for all the wrongs done or meditated against you, to lay my heart, hand and fortune at your feet, love for love, and to beg you to be my wife. Rose, I am at your feet. Will you forgive me? Will you accept me, and be my beloved wife?" he supplicated, sinking upon one knee, and taking her hand.

She snatched it from him and shrunk away, exclaiming:

"Wild, Lady Etheridge. However this may eventually result, whoever may be declared the true heiress of this you may rest assured that, 'possession being nine points of the law,' it must, in any case, be mine for ever, lest I should rush out and catch you to my bosom. Do not be cold to me now; indeed, it would break my heart, and cut short even the few hours I have to live. Do not shrink from me now, my only child!" pleaded the woman, in a voice of such deep sorrow that Lady Etheridge bent down and tenderly kissed her, saying:

"I do not, mother. I have come to stay with you till the last."

"Oh, thank you, Laura!" cried the wretched woman, pressing her hand with spasmodic hastle. "And you forgive—"

"Poor mother! Forgiveness is a profane word to pass from child to parent."

"Yet I cannot rest without it, Laura."

"Then take it, with all my heart. If you think that you have injured me in the meaning of this? It seems to me that to-day I have stepped into a train of strange adventures."

"Not so strange, either, as those you had marked out for yourself when you proposed, in the same day, to marry a peeress and a peasant, meaning against which of the two did you meditate the blackest treachery? Against the outlawed lady whom you were about to lead to the altar, or the ill-loved cottage!, whom you were alarming to destruction? Tell me, Laura! what blackness of wickedness! Stand out of my way, sir, and let me pass. Your presence was not pleasing to my

"Stand still, I command you!" exclaimed Colonel Hastings, turning toward his son, "here is a dilemma. What do you think of this?"

"Nay, I should ask that question of yourself, my dear sir, and of Rose, who, I think, has been all the bedside of this woman Elmer, and have taken her dying deposition. What do you think of it?"

Before answering, Colonel Hastings desired to see went to ascertain if there was that no one was hearing. Then he returned to his seat, stooped close to the ear of his son, and whispered:

"I think that the little village maiden, Rose Elmer, is the true Baroness Etheridge, and that you ordered me the evidence leaves no doubt upon the question; and if that evidence should be laid before the House of Lords, she would be immediately declared as such."

"Well?"

"But that evidence shall never come before the tribunal. I will destroy it, and I believe that dying woman's deposition. The only other witness is in my pay, and at my mercy, and he will be to keep him subservient to one who can reward him with gold, or punish him with a halter, and he will be silent until I give him leave to speak. So make up your quarrel with Laura, and let the matter be settled, and be as

"And you, my child, what are your plans for the future?"

"I shall remain with Rose for a few weeks longer, until she is more used to her changed circumstances. And in the meantime I shall advertise in the Times for the situation of a private governess to some gentleman's or nobleman's family," replied Laura, with a faint smile.

CHAPTER XI.

We return to Ferdinand Cassinove, the humble secretary of Colonel Hastings.

Upon the same evening that the supposed Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne had made a conveyance of her estate to her betrothed husband, the several documents had been collected and intrusted to young Cassinove, with directions to proceed immediately to London, and lodge them, for greater security, in the hands of the family solicitor, and afterward to go to the house in Portman Square and wait the return of his patron. And the young man, glad to escape the presence of that queenly woman, whom he could not look upon without love, and could not love without sin, promptly obeyed the order of his employer, and the same night set out on his journey to London. At the time he reached the city, executed his commission and returned to his own peculiar den in a great house in Portman Square, he found the arrival of Colonel Hastings, who was expected in town immediately after the marriage of his son and the departure of the happy pair upon their bridal tour. With his whole soul consuming with a passion that his reason assured him to be as well founded in esteem as it was hopeless in prospect, young Cassinove passed many weary days, vaguely wondering at the prolonged absence and unaccountable silence of his patron. At that day news did not travel with anything of the alacrity with which it flies at this. Young Cassinove heard nothing of events progressing at Swinburne Castle.

Nearly a month had elapsed since his return to Portman Square, when, one evening, the household was startled by the sudden arrival of their long-expected master, accompanied by his son, who was supposed at that very time to be far upon his bridal tour.

Colonel Hastings received the surprised looks of his household with many oaths, that did not tend to restore their self-possession, and then retiring to his library, called and ordered the attendance of his secretary.

Ferdinand Cassinove entered the presence of his employer, saying:

"The deeds are safely deposited with the Brothers Barlin."

"D—— the deeds. They are not worth the parchment they are written upon," roared the colonel, in a fury, following up his exclamation with a volley of oaths that made the secretary stare in astonishment, and doubt whether his venerable patron had not been for once overtaken by intoxication.

"I trust, sir, that no misfortune," began Ferdinand, but he was interrupted by a terrible torrent of profanity, and the words:

"Misfortune, misfortune! Worse, sir. A confoundedly ridiculous contretemps that has made us a nine days' wonder —a town talk all over the country."

"Whatever it was, it does not in any way affect Mr. Hastings, or his bride?"

"Perdition, sir! It was just those two whom it did affect," exclaimed the old man.

Ferdinand turned very pale, and moved a step nearer, and then, from very agitation, sank back into his chair, murmuring:

"And what, sir, if I may be permitted to ask, is the nature of this calamity, and the manner in which it touches Mr. Hastings and his bride?"

"Confound it, sir! At the very last moment it broke off the marriage."

Cassinove sprang upon his feet with a cry of irrepressible joy.

Colonel Hastings mistook this for an exclamation of astonishment, and, thinking himself sure of an interested and sympathizing listener, he related, with many imprecations, the discovery that had been made at Swinburne, with the events that followed.

Young Cassinove listened with a joy that it was almost impossible to conceal, all the while saying to himself:

"She may yet be mine—she may yet be mine. The noble creature may yet be mine. Oh, what a revulsion from despair to hope and happiness! Now I have an incentive to action; now I have an inspiration to live and do, and endure; now shall days of toil and nights of study anticipate the long passage of years, and I will win fame and wealth to lay both at her feet. I will restore to more than she lost. Heart it, oh, ye spirits that inspire and direct noble passions, and bless my efforts!"

While these glowing hopes and inspirations warmed the bosom of the ardent young Italian, Colonel Hastings brought his long story to an end, concluding with the words:

"And, of course, you must be aware, Cassinove, that there could be but one line of action for us, my son's destined bride being proved an impostor."

"Impostor, sir," indignantly interrupted the young man.

"Well, not impostor, exactly, since she was no conscious party to the fraud that imposed her upon the late baron as his daughter and heiress; but as she was discovered and proved to be the daughter of the late gamekeeper, of course, a family of unblemished lineage like our own could not possibly receive her. Mr. Albert Hastings, with my full approbation, requested to be freed, and was freed, from his engagement to her."

"The base traitor!" exclaimed Cassinove, in indignant scorn.

"Sir!" vociferated the colonel, in astonishment at his secretary's boldness.

"I say the base traitor! And would to Heaven I had the brother's privilege of chastising him for the most infamous act that I ever knew a man to be guilty of!"

"Get out of my house, sir!" cried the colonel, striking toward Cassinove, and shaking his fist.

"I intend to do so; but not until I have told you expressed my opinion. That seeming sad reverse of this most noble lady is really no misfortune, but a happy substitute for her, since the same providential blow that deprived her of rank, wealth and title, dashed from her side a wretch unfit to breathe the same air, or tread the same earth with herself."

"Will you begone from my house, sir?" thundered the old colonel, advancing on him.

"I am gone! Not one moment would I remain in the service of those whose own lips destined their new dishonor."

The enraged old man rushed upon the younger one with uplifted hands and furious eyes.

But Cassinove, taking off his hat, turned and calmly confronted his employer, saying:

"Sir, the gray hairs that have not brought you respect yet protect you from resentment. I wish you good-night, Colonel Hastings, and a better understanding of that which really blemishes an unblemished lineage," and with a bow the young man left the room, and hurried immediately to his own little den on the third floor, where he commenced preparations for a hasty departure. It was the work of a few moments to pack his slender wardrobe and small stock of books. Next he called a cab, and had his luggage to be put upon the vehicle, and directed the driver to take him to No. 4 Fifth-ring street. A half hour's drive through the intricate thoroughfares of the centre of London brought him to a small, clean-looking thread-and-needle shop, that bore over the door the sign "Ruth Russel." Pulling up here, he got out and went into the cheerfully lighted little shop that was for this moment occupied only by a middle-aged, kind-hearted woman of about thirty years of age, dressed in a widow's weeds and cap, and standing behind the counter.

"Well, Mrs. Russel, how does the business?" said young Cassinove, cheerfully, as he entered.

"Oh, very indifferently, I thank you, sir," replied the woman; "orders for shirts are quite enough, and I should have sent them yesterday, only Frank is sick with a cold, and Emily needs to look after him."

"Frank is the boy, I believe, that you have had the trouble to come."

"Reassure yourself, Mrs. Russel, I have not come to order needle-work. I wish to know if your second floor front is let?"

"Oh, no, sir! The rooms take no better than the shop, somehow. It seems very unlucky; but I suppose it is my fault."

"I am sure it is not; and, as a proof of my confidence, I have brought you a lodger in myself, if you will take me."

"Oh, sellingly! gladly, sir!" replied the little widow, her black eyes beaming with delight. "When would you wish to take possession?"

"Immediately, if the rooms are ready. My luggage is at the door."

"Very well; I will have fires lighted, there instantly. To air the rooms is all that is necessary," said Mrs. Russel, hurrying into the back parlor to give the necessary directions, while Cassinove went out to have his luggage brought in, and pay the cabman.

And in ten minutes Mr. Cassinove was installed comfortably in his new quarters, consisting of a sitting room front, and bedroom back, both very neat and clean, though small and plainly furnished.

He lost no time, but immediately unpacked his writing-case, set it upon his table, and wrote an advertisement to be put in the Times, to the effect that a young gentleman, a graduate of Christ Church, desired a situation as private tutor or secretary in a gentleman's or nobleman's family.

The same night he dispatched this to the office of the Times, and within two days he received an answer, requesting him to call at No.——Grosvenor square.

CHAPTER XII.

Laura Elmer arrived in London alone, at nightfall. Leaving the mail-coach, she called a fly, had her luggage put on, and directed the driver to drive to a house in one of the most fashionable localities in the West End. An hour's ride brought her to within a few blocks of her destination. To get nearer seemed impossible, from the long line of carriages that stood along the street in front of the house, and stopped the way. Every circumstance seemed to indicate that a large evening party was being entertained at the house in question.

Laura put down the window, and asked the driver:

"Can you go no farther?"

"No, ma'am; not as yet," answered the cabman.

"How long will we have to stay here?"

"Himpossible to say, mum. Here be a great crowd, as her la'ship his 'aving of a ball, or summut."

Laura sank back in her seat, and waited perhaps half an hour before the cab drew up to the door, which, standing open, revealed a lighted hall, with a supercilious-looking porter, seated in an armchair, and several footmen in attendance—to one of whom Laura handed her card.

Laura Elmer was dressed in deep mourning, and muffled in the cloak and hood in which she had traveled from Swinburne. But there was in her air and manner a certain dignity that seemed to mark her as a lady of high rank. The servant that received her card bowed low, and ran quickly up the broad staircase to the door of a cloakroom, where several splendidly-dressed ladies were laying off their wrapping before passing into the drawing-room.

Laura saw at once the servant's very natural error, and turning, said:

"I think you mistake me for one of the invited guests this evening."

Even that explanation did not shake the servant's faith in the high position of the noble-looking woman before him. He glanced at her deep mourning, and thought he saw in it a reason why she was not a guest of the gay party. He answered, respectfully:

"I beg your pardon, madam; if you will be so good as to walk into the library, I will take your card up to her ladyship."

And the man opened a door on the left, and showed the visitor into a spacious and richly furnished library. Laura seated herself at a table, and mechanically turned over the leaves of a folio while waiting the return of the servant.

Presently she heard voices without the door—one was that of the footman who had carried up her card, and who seemed to be apologizing for the mistake he had made. The other was the voice of an elderly female servant, who was roundly lecturing the man in the following words:

"To carry up the governess' card to her ladyship in the drawing-room! Ashamed of you, James! but hi never could teach you the difference between a lady and a woman. How could you know a lady from a woman, but among ladies, hi can halways tell a mistress, has 'onorable gentlemen, honorable chioness, and duchess, the minute hi see one, and hi graduates my 'respects accordingly. Had similarly among young ladies, I can tell at sight a miss, than 'onerable miss, hand a lady; but like master, like man, my respect hac-cordingly. Now, a governess, James, is not by no means a lady. Now you shall see how I receive this governess."

"Just so, Mrs. Jones; you'll put her on her proper footing in no time."

"You shall see, James."

But Mrs. Jones did not know that there were spiritual hierarchies as dominant as were earthly ones, and that in Laura Elmer's person lived the honor-compelling spirit of a queen.

She opened the door and bustled in, swinging herself from side to side, with all the insolence of a pampered menial, and was about to speak, when Laura Elmer raised her stately head, and fixed her full, dark eyes upon the woman's face; whereupon the latter immediately, and quite involuntarily, dropped a curtsey, and, address—I Miss Elmer very respectfully, said:

"My lady has sent me to receive you, ma'am. Would you prefer to see your room before you take supper?"

"I thank you; you may show me to my apartment, and send me a cup of tea; that is all I shall require to-night," said Laura.

The housekeeper touched a bell, which was answered by a housemaid, to whom she said:

"Show Miss Elmer to the bedchamber adjoining the schoolroom, and take her up a cup of tea."

The girl brought a light, and requesting Miss Elmer to precede her, showed her the way from the library.

"There, James, you see with what self-respect and dignity hi treat the governess," said the housekeeper, just as soon as the restraining influence of Laura's presence was withdrawn.

"Can't say as I did, Mrs. Jones," said the footman, very drily.

"You seem, at least, hi kept her at a distance," said the housekeeper.

"I see you kept yourself at respectful distance, just as I should, if any haccident was to throw me in the way of her majesty the queen."

"You're a himperent fellow, and hi shall report you to Sir Vincent!" exclaimed the housekeeper, in a fury, as, swinging herself from side to side, she brushed out of the room.

"Well! governess or duchess, I could no more fall in respects to that young lady than I could to Lady Lester herself! Leastways, when I'm in her presence; nor no more could you, Mrs. Jones, for all your swinging about of your fat hoops behind her. Why, she's grander looking, in her plain black dress, than all the peeresses in their velvets and diamonds, as I had hannounced in the drawing-room this hevening," was the acute criticism of the footman, James, as he resumed his post of service in the hall below.

Meanwhile, Laura Elmer was conducted by the housemaid to her apartment, next the schoolroom, in the third story.

"My lady appointed this floor as the apartments of the young ladies and governess, upon account of its quiet and fresh air, and I am directed to wait on you and them, ma'am. Is there anything I can bring you with your tea?" asked the girl, as she ushered Miss Elmer into the comfortably furnished and well-lighted bedroom, where her luggage had already been brought.

"Nothing else, thank you. My good girl, what is your name?"

"Lizzy, ma'am."

"Thank you, Lizzy," said Miss Elmer, laying off her wrappings and bonnet, and throwing herself into an armchair before the bright fire.

And then the excitement that had sustained her through the long journey subsided, now that it was over. There came a strong reaction, and she burst into a passion of tears; but not one thought was given to the loss of wealth or title; a commonplace woman might indeed have wept bitterly for the loss of these, but Laura Elmer could only weep for the greater bereavement of her heart.

"If he had been taken away from me by death, while I yet believed him to be true and noble, then, indeed, I could have borne it! I should have put on mourning, and lived through all my pilgrimage on earth a widowed maiden for his sake, waiting for that death which should reunite us in eternal love. But now! but now! he is lost to me forever, in time and in eternity."

She dropped her face once more upon her hands, and sobbed as though the very fountains of her life were breaking up.

Thus bitterly she wept, in her hour of weakness for the false-hearted traitor, caring nothing, knowing nothing of the true and noble heart who had secretly consecrated himself to her service, and who would gladly have shed his lifeblood, drop by drop, to have saved her from shedding tears.

Not long did her weakness last. She dashed the sparkling drops from her eyes, murmuring:

"I must not give way to sorrow for the past. I must struggle through my life. I must not murmur at misfortune, but rather thank Heaven for the blessings that are left. I have lost wealth, position and my false lover; but I have left youth, health, intellect, and much acquired knowledge, with many accomplishments. These will always enable me to lead a useful life. How much more favored am I still than half my fellow-creatures! I will grieve no more, but rather show my gratitude to Heaven by a cheerful industry in the station in life which Providence has assigned me."

She arose, bathed her eyes and smoothed her hair, and resumed her seat just as Lizzie entered with the tea tray.

And after this slight refreshment, Laura Elmer dismissed her attendant and retired to bed. She could not sleep. The novelty of her position was too great to have disturbed her repose; but this was not all. Accustomed all her life to the luxurious stillness of Swinburne Castle, where her own delicious sleeping-room was blind to light and deaf to sound, she found the noise of the London streets a perfect antidote to sleep. All night long there was the sound of carriages coming and going, as late guests arrived and early ones departed. At length, even this ceased, broke and all the rest of the world woke to life London became quiet.

Laura Elmer dropped asleep, and was visited by a singular dream or vision. First there was infused into her soul a delicious warmth and light, strengthening as soothing. She was again at Swinburne Castle. The beautiful and beloved home of her childhood and youth was bathed in the sunshine of a glorious summer's day. Many loving friends were around her, and by her side was one whose kingly countenance seemed strange, yet strangely familiar, and whom, in her dream, she loved with a passion as profound as it was elevated, as ardent as it was pure.

In his hand he held the coronet of her ancient house. This glittering diadem he placed upon her brow, saying:

"Hail, my beloved! once more Laura, Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne!"

With the words, the vision of this diadem inspired awoke, and the beautiful vision fled. The vision fled, but its influence did not. Calm and strengthened and elevated, she knew not therefore, except through the influences of her dream, she arose and made her simple morning toilet—a plain, black bombazine dress, and black crape collar. Her rich and abundant black hair, worn in plain bands, was her only headdress. By the time she had completed her toilet, which, simple as it was, occupied her longer than usual, for she was quite unaccustomed to waiting upon herself, there came a gentle rap at the chamber door, and to her "Come in," entered the little maid.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, ma'am, I thought you would want me to assist you," said Lizzy; adding, "breakfast is quite ready."

"Show me the way, then, child," said Miss Elmer.

The maid conducted our heroine to a small sitting-room adjoining the schoolroom, where a table was laid for the morning meal.

"The young ladies and the governess take their meals here, ma'am, if you please."

"And where are the young ladies?"

"If you please, ma'am, Mrs Rachel will bring them directly."

And even as the maid spoke, a respectable, middle-aged matron entered, leading two dark-eyed little girls, of about ten and twelve years, by the hand, whom she presented to the governess as Miss Lester and Miss Lucy Lester, adding:

"Now, my dears, this lady is your teacher. You will be very good, and not plague her as much as you did Miss Primrose."

"But I hated Miss Primrose, nurse, and I shall hate this one, too; I know I shall," said the elder child.

"For shame, Miss Lester! Go and speak to your governess as a young lady should," said the nurse.

The children crew back, frowning and sulky; but Laura advanced toward them with outstretched hands, saying:

"I am very glad to see you, my dears, and I am sure you will try to stay with me."

Her voice was so sweet, and her look so gracious and benignant, that the children readily met her offered hands, and looked up into her face with smiley faces, like sunshine through the clouds.

The elder one looked up shyly into her face, and said:

"I am sorry that I said anything to offend you, ma'am; but Miss Primrose was such a plague! But I will please you."

"I hope so; and now shall we go to breakfast?" said Laura, leading the little girl to the table.

The nurse had left the schoolroom, and now returned, leading in a boy of about eleven years old, saying:

"I am a great boy to be in a lady's schoolroom, Miss Elmer; but you will find me not at all unmanageable."

"Of that i am quite sure," replied the governess.

The boy joined the circle at the breakfast table, where the children broke into a conversation, more remarkable for vivacity than for propriety.

Laura looked from one to another of her pupils, thinking within herself:

"Providence never intended me for the duties I am now performing. Christ-like patience and forbearance will be needful in all those matters, which only bore me."

All this time Laura Elmer had stood with her stately form drawn up, and her large, dark, starry eyes, looking steadily down upon the fair inanity before her.

"I am sure I cannot conceive why Sir Vincent should wish me to see you," said her ladyship, in a tone of vexation, and then, for the first time, raising her languid eyes to the face of the governess, she asked:

"Can you suggest anything else?"

Then seeing for the first time, that queenly form, and meeting, for the first time, that queenly spirit shining through the great, calm, luminous eyes, she instinctively bowed before it and involuntarily said:

"I beg your pardon, Miss Elmer, for having kept you standing so long. Pray take a seat."

"I thank you, madam, but if your ladyship has really no commands for me, I will ask your permission to return to my charge."

"I really do not know that I have anything to suggest to you, Miss Elmer. Yet now I think of it, I wish you to tell me, do they make you comfortable? I have all these children to attend to."

"Quite comfortable, I thank you, madam."

"If you find there is anything that you require for your comfort or your happiness, let Jones know; and if she neglects your orders, inform Sir Vincent. He has more energy than I have, and relieves me of all that sort of trouble."

"I thank your ladyship," Laura said, "There is nothing I require for my comfort; and, for my happiness, I fear it would be unjust to compel poor Jones to provide for that," she added, mentally.

Then bidding her ladyship good-morning, she retired from her presence.

In the outer hall, she found herself waylaid by another footman, with Sir Vincent's respects to her, and a request that she would favor him with a few moments conversation in the library.

Again Laura smiled to herself, thinking:

"If the baronet is no more alive to his paternal duties than her ladyship, this interview will be a mere form."

She was shown into the richly-furnished library, filled with the treasures of literature, science and art of two centuries of accumulation, and lighted by a tall, Gothic window of stained glass, that diffused "a dim, religious light" throughout the vast room. In a large, antique chair, beside a writing-table, in the centre of the room, sat a tall, stout, very handsome man, aged about sixty-five, regular and well-chiseled features, dark gray eyes, heavy, black eyebrows, a large, well-formed nose, and a full, handsome mouth, were all framed in by a luxuriant growth of shining black hair and whiskers.

On seeing Miss Elmer, he arose with a stately curtsey, and placed a chair for her, saying, as he handed her to her seat:

"I requested the favor of your company here, Miss Elmer, that I might consult with you upon the subject of your new pupils."

Laura bowed and waited his further speech.

"You have, I presume, just left Lady Lester?"

"Yes, Sir Vincent."

"The delicate constitution, and the numerous social responsibilities of her ladyship, prevent her from giving that attention to her children that she would otherwise."

The baronet paused. He seemed anxious to defend his wife's indifference to her children, yet unable to do so with truth. At length he said:

"You have seen your future pupils?"

"I have seen them."

"I hope, that notwithstanding their very neglected condition, you find them not unpromising subjects."

"Decidedly not. They seem to me to be unusually gifted, though somewhat undisciplined," said Laura, with a smile, adding: "However, I should have informed you, sir, that I have little experience in children, never having filled the situation of governess before."

The baronet looked up in surprise, then drawing toward him an open letter that lay upon the table, and referring to it, he said:

"Ah, yes, Dr. Seymour has written that unfortunate circumstance has placed Miss Elmer under the necessity of seeking a situation in life for which she was not originally destined; but that her moral and intellectual qualifications eminently fit her. I must confess that I am surprised, and at the same time I congratulate myself and my children. Miss Elmer."

Laura bowed and remained silent.

The baronet then went over the list of studies that he wished his children to pursue, and left the decision to her.

"I hope you will allow me to look in to your schoolroom sometimes—Miss Elmer, to see how such pursuits as my somewhat longer and more intimate acquaintance with your pupils might suggest," said the baronet, smiling.

"My inexperience will thank you, sir."

And seeing that the interview was closed, she was about to rise, when the door suddenly opened, and a figure glided in that immediately arrested her attention.

It was that of a young woman of about twenty years of age, who would have been beautiful but for the deathly pallor of her thin face, that looked still more ghastly white in contrast with the raven blackness of her hair, eyebrows, and large, wild eyes, and her dress of deep mourning.

The wasted, sharp-featured countenance, and arose in haste and agitation, and advanced to meet her.

But she paused, and, extending her thin, white arms, clasping her transparent hands, and fixing her wild black eyes in an agony of supplication upon his face.

"Helen, why are you here? What is this?" he inquired, in a deep and smothered voice, as he took her hand, and led her, unresisting, from the room.

Feeling it to be impossible to follow them, Laura Elmer retained her seat for a few moments, at the end of which time the baronet re-entered the library, in a state of agitation almost frightful to behold. The veins of his forehead was swollen out like blue cords, his nostrils were dilated and quivering, his lips grimly clenched, his cheeks highly flushed, his dark eyes contracted and glittering, his large frame shaking. He evidently struggled to suppress the exhibition of his emotions as he resumed his seat, and, trembling, dropped his face upon his hands.

It's plain to be seen that good dressers are pinning their faith to OUR KIND OF TAILORING. Suits—$15.00, 17.00, 19.00 to 24.00. Overcoats—$15 to 27 00. Trousers —$3.50 to 7.00. We assume all risk of a perfect fit— as we will not ask you to accept a garment that is not right in every detail.

New Fall Hats

The Fall Hats are now ready.

We've not missed a style that's correct.

Most men buy hats in an off hand way —as it were a matter of little account. It's a bad idea, for nothing so makes or mars a man's appearance as his hat.

Don't accept an indifferent hat. Our Fall Hats are extra value, it matters not what price you buy.

Our $1.00 Christie Wool Hats are sold at $1.25 and $1.50 in many city stores.

$2 00 buys our Fur Felt Christie and Tiger Brands English Hats. They are correct in shape and unequalled in quality Christie's $2.50 Derby is a beauty.

New York $3 Knickerbockers are perfect in every detail and are worn by nearly all good dressers. We have the exclusive agency for the above hats, and will replace any hat purchased at $2.00 or over that does not give perfect satisfaction.

—The Town Council at its last session appointed Mr. E. S. Lapum town treasurer, to succeed Mr. Robt. Mill, resigned. Mr. L. puts his duties with a knowledge of municipal matters, is a good business man, and should fill the bill satisfactorily. Mr. J. Frank Chalmers was appointed secretary of the electric light plant, to receive $75 for his services until the end of the year.

My Lord in Livery

—The test of the new electric light plant was finished this week. Mr. Kelsch insisted on several changes, which are about made, and it is likely the plant will be taken over by the town tomorrow or next Monday. Last week the schooner Katie Eccles discharged 220 tons of coal at the wharf, and another schooner load will arrive next week. The coal costs $3.85 per ton, laid down on the wharf, which is considered very reasonable, the estimate made for coal at the inception of the scheme being $4.00 to $4.10 per ton.

Good Music

—A run off occurred at the G. T. R. station just west of the Depot, about 7.30 o'clock last Friday night, the result being that the accident occurred in a muddy spot. Several foreigners, a lot of Italian laborers was just entering the siding when several cars ran off, blocking both the east and west tracks. The auxiliary was called and it took several hours to clear the track. The cars were of the old dilapidated kind and the damage will be slight to the company.

STORM STRESS AND ELEMENTAL CONFUSION PRECEDE GROWTH.

TALMAGE'S WORD OF HOPE

Social Disturbances, Upheavals, Labor Strikes, and the Conflict of the "Classes and the Masses" Inevitable Precursors of Orderly National Development—This Also Is Nature's Method of Attaining to Perfection.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1906, by Frederick Niver, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 14.—In this sermon the preacher shows that as storms, stress and elemental confusion are the forerunners of growth, so disorderly development in nature, so social disturbances, upheavals, labor strikes and the conflict of "the classes and the masses" are the inevitable precursors of orderly national development. The text is Proverbs xiv., 4, "Where no oxen are, the crib is clean, but much increase is by the strength of the ox."

All true lovers of the beautiful should read the messages of its great high priest, John Ruskin. There never lived a man who wielded a poetic-prose pen like his. His "Seven Lamps of Architecture" and "Ethics of the Dust" and "Stones of Venice," his "Sesame and Lilies" and "Crown of Wild Olive," his "Studies of Wayside Flowers" and of "The Cloud Form and the "Relation of Natural Science to Art" offer to the aesthetic intellectual cultivation of this world which cannot be found among the writings of any other writer, living or dead.

If you have read John Ruskin carefully you may remember how in one chapter he makes a mighty plea for the aesthetics of life as against the ruthless invasion of commercialism. He denounces in vehement language the heartless vandalism of the business world which would paint a horrible advertisement of some patent medicine upon the rocks of a majestic palisade or frowning Gibraltar. He bewails the fact that England's artistic sensibilities are so chilled and dulled that she would allow the manufacturer's wheel to turn into a muddy stream the clear, beautiful water that leap out of the mountains, and he denounces the iconoclastic brutality of the lumberman who would bury the axe in the heart of the grand oaks that for centuries have been lifting up their leafy hands to God in an attitude of prayer. But, though John Ruskin, our teacher, our Gamaliel, our archaelic high priest who leads us in worship at the altar of the beautiful, stands like a knight for the preservation of the woods and the valleys, though he would strike down the hands of the iconoclast who would desecrate the high cliff, yet the whole world knows that his passionate and the farmers could never cover their fields with grain. In order that the increasing human race may live we must cut and tear down and slash. In many senses we must have a chaotic cosmos in order to have progressive.

If you will turn to my text and read it carefully, as the inspired penman meant it to be read, you will find that the thought which I am enunciating King Solomon taught in his book of Proverbs and shorthand reporters. He goes out one morning, when the complaining farmer enters his barn. Everything there is filthy and dirty. The straw beds upon which the oxen slept are all mussed up and must be raked out into the barnyard and the stalls cleaned. The chickens have flown into the haymow and scratched the hay. Their food have scattered it everywhere. "Oh, dear," exclaims the farmer, "just look at that barn. Did you ever see such a mess? It is work, work, work, clean, clean, clean. I never finish fixing up the barn one day, but I have to go to work and fix it all up again the next." "Tis true that what you say is hard," answers the wisest of all men. "But farmer, remember that you cannot have tidiness and cleanliness if you have oxen, and if you did you have any oxen you could not plough your fields and could not reap your grain or would not receive any financial return from your lands." Thus King Solomon says to us to-day: "Disorder must be. It is best to have disorder. Sometimes it is best to have an upheaval. Where no oxen are, the crib is clean, but the disorder you deplore and the increase of property you rejoice in are inseparable from the presence of the ox, and you cannot have one without the other."

A valuable practical lesson is this thought for almost every department of life. In the first place, it will apply to the disorders of the natural world. Some people, if they could have their way, would never have a rainstorm. They would never have a blizzard. They would never have the trees robbed of their leaves. They would never have them stand in a uniform of spotless white, like grim soldiers with their bayonets of ice as sharp pointed as Roman spears. They would never have the wagon wheels sink hub deep in mud or the robins and the thrushes far away from the New England hills to the land of the flowers. They would always have their orchards heavy laden with fruit, and their fields covered with grass, and their gardens crowded with incense waving flowers, and their meadlehds with their ripened grain, making the valleys look like a banquet hall of gold, and the blue heavens unflecked by one dark cloud. The sun for them would send forth a never ceasing radiance. "Oh, why should we have the rain?" they cry. "Why do the December winds come to make our teeth chatter and our blood to freeze? Why do we have the spring freshets wash out our roads and sweep away our country bridges? Why all this disorder and confusion in the natural world? No man can worship God in draining fog or the chilly haze when he has to hug a fire in a house which has to be hermetically sealed to keep out the winter's biting blasts."

But in the light of my text, are not atmospheric disorders a blessing? Are not the frosts and the blizzards and the soft white quilts of snow flung over our lawns and the spring freshets beneficent factors of growth

ANKLE REDUCING

"ONE OF THE 14"

A DOLLY VARDEN ANKLE

Some athletes have clumsy figures while others enjoy the graceful lines of a Sandow.

Some feminine ankles are swollen and bulky while others are as slender as a fawn's.

Whether clumsy or graceful, bulky or slender the method of training is the cause.

The ankles are completely surrounded by muscles. If these muscles are constantly strained and stretched by the feet wabbling about on unskillfully built shoe foundations, bulky ankles cannot fail to ensue.

Dolly Vardens reduce bulky ankles and preserve slender ones. Why?

Because of their Free Flat Tread, which allows the feet to rest free and flat on the sole. This prevents bending and bowing of the ankles and the consequent stretching of the ankle muscles.

Because of their newly devised steel arch support, which holds up the arch and relieves the vertical ankle muscles from the tension occasioned by falling arch.

Because of their Dead Level Ball and Heel Balance which throws the ankles into their natural vertical position.

Because they hold the foot and ankle firmly at every point in a corset-like grip.

The Dolly Varden Agent in your city will be pleased to show you Ankle Reducing Dolly Vardens. Purchasers or investigators equally welcome. In the States and Canada at the same price—$3.50 and $4.00. Every Pair Goodyear Welted. (To be continued.)

WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Mr. Tyte-Phist—More money? What have you done with that dollar I gave you last week?

Mrs. Tyte-Phist—That's in the savings bank, but I can't draw the money until next January. I want another dollar to run the house on for the meantime.

Tit Dement, Dyspepsia—In olden time it was a popular belief that demons could be driven through the subject air, seeking to enter into men and trouble them. At the present day the demon, dyspepsia, is at large in the same way, and many unfortunates know who by careless or unwise indulgence in food and one he enters. Indeed, it is difficult to dislodge him, but that has himself there possessed should know that a valiant friend to do battle for him with Dr. Morse's Indian Pulmo's Vegetable Pills, which are ever ready for the trial.

Ada—And you didn't propose to her? Why?

Ada—Why, he was leading up to it, but suddenly noted that her mother had a sort of knowledge judgement thing.

A Magic Pill—Dyspepsia is a foe with which men are constantly grappling, but comparatively few gain a victory. Indeed, and to all appearances vanquish one, it makes its appearance in another direction. In many the disease appears in the form of a weak stomach, or of a watch or resentful temperament, which even a breath will make a variation. With such Dr. Morse's Indian Root Pills are a boon from the most trivial causes and they must suffer long. To these Pulmeiee's Vegetable Pills are recommended as mild and sure.

Jessie—Say, pa, who was Pandora?

Jessie's Pa—Pandora, my son, was the first woman. Engaged girls don't know because she didn't keep the lid down.

A General Favorite — In every place where introduced Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil has not failed to establish a reputation, showing that the sterling qualities which it possesses are valued everywhere when they become known. It is in general use in Canada and other countries as a household medicine and the demand for it each year shows that it is found to wherever used.

"I don't get much fertilizer up in the world," said the old-time grower, "but I always decided to let her have all there was of it. Them city folks ain't dies better in that time than she's been any. I may let her alone for good an' all!"

Cholera morbus, cramps and cholera morbus immediately make their appearance at the same time as the use of unripe green fruit, cucumbers, melons, etc., and many persons are deterred from eating these tempting delicacies, but they need not abstain if they will use Dr. D. Kellog's Dysentery Cordial, and take a few drops in a little sugar, when the pain will cease in a remarkable manner and a quick recovery effected.

Stern Mother—When George proposed to you did you tell him to see me? Daughter—Yes, mamma, and he said he'd seen you several times, but that I was the first he'd seen.

For the safe, prompt and effectual worm killer, Mother Graves' Worm Exterminator has no equal. Procure a bottle and take it home.

Little Harold had been directed by the teacher to write the word "Holly." "I can't," said Harold, "cause my pencil's busted."

"Why, Harold! What did you say was wrong with your pencil?"

"It's busted."

"Dear me! Children, can any of you tell what Harold means? I'm sure he hasn't used the right word."

Up went the hand of little Marjorie. "Ah, Marjorie dear, I thought you would know what Harold means."

"He meanth that hith penthil ith blunticated."

HARVEY.

Have you tried Holloway's Corn Cure? If not, do so at once and get rid of these troublesome excrescences as many have testified who have tried it.

At a prisoner was brought before Judge Sherman for sentence the other day, he appeared to be very much frightened to see the officer in charge of the prisoner what the offence was with which he was charged.

"Bigotry, your Honor.

"Bigotry, your Honor. He's been married to his wife for twenty years."

"Why, officer, that's not bigotry," said the judge, as he gave a prisoner his freedom.

Chance—Now that your summer vacation is over, I suppose the principal thing you have to save money for is your girl's Christmas present.

Bendick—Oh! I'll have to buy two this year.

Chance—What! Two girls, eh?

Bendick—No, two presents; hers to me and mine to her. I married her last week.

Tom—I hear Fred is married. I always thought he was too timid for anything as serious as that.

Jack—Oh, he married a widow.

Tom—A widow! How did he meet her?

Jack—He didn't meet her at all; ate overtook him.

Dr. Whipple, long Bishop of Minnesota, was about to hold religious services near an Indian village in one of the Western States, and before going to the place of meeting asked the chief who was his host whether it was safe for him to leave his effects unguarded in the lodge.

"Plenty safe," grunted the red man. "No white man in a hundred miles from here."

Rubinstein on Piano Playing.

When a pupil happened to ask Rubinstein how certain passages should be construed, he invariably showed them But if a pupil asked, "Shall I play this in this manner or that?"—both equally correct—Rubinstein invariably replied "Play as you feel. Is the day rainy? Play it this way. Is the day sunny? Play it the other way."

Cutting.

A certain photographer is exhibiting in his window the photograph of a young man with the following inscription attached to it: "This is the man who put his hair in curls to have his photograph taken and then can't pay for them."

It Might Have Been Worse.

Lydia—I'm just as mad as I can be with Charlie. He kissed me right before all the girls. Georgette—Well women will not permit her charms to fade. Either by illness, which causes appetite failing, nerves gitting on edge, color fading, she takes Ferrozone. How it sharpens the appetite! How quickly it gives color to the cheeks, buoyancy to the step. Better try, anyway. It will make a new being, with new vigor and ability to confront life's every duty. HANKFUL MOTHER.

"I thank you with all my heart for what Baby's Own Tablets have done for my little girl," says Mrs. Pierre Charuele, jr., of St. Boniface, Que. "When I began giving her the Tablets she seemed to be pining away, but after using less than a box she was rapidly gaining and she is now a fine, fat, healthy little one, and I write you this as the acknowledgement of a mother who will never forget what Baby's Own Tablets have done for her child." Letters like this must bring hope and comfort to all mothers who have feeble or sickly children. Baby's Own Tablets cure all the minor ailments and can be given just as safely to a new born baby as to a well grown child. If you cannot get these Tablets from your dealer write The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont., and get them at 25c a box.

SUGGIES.

You can get the very best make at F. W. VanDusen's show room, in the Campbell House Block. Call and inspect them, and see for yourself that for style and workmanship they cannot be excelled. F. W. VANDUSEN Harness Maker. 15

Coldness of Ice.

It seems strange to think that some ice is colder than other ice. The terms "ice cold" always seems to signify a definite temperature. All water under similar conditions freezes at a certain definite temperature. But when the thermometer falls below that it continues to affect the ice, making it harder and colder. The test has been made by placing a piece of ice from the north and a piece of ice formed in the vicinity of New York near a stove together. The former took much longer to melt than the latter.

Viewing the Remains.

It had been a strenuous afternoon for the devoted teacher who took six of her pupils through the Museum of Natural History, but her charges had enjoyed every minute of the time.

"Where have you been, boys?" asked the father of two of the party that night, and the answer came with joyous promptness:

"We're bean to a dead circus."

Town Without Horses or Wheels.

The town of Funchal, in the Madeira islands, is a town with no horses and no wheeled vehicles. In traveling about one either drives in a sledge or is carried in a hammock. The streets and adjacent roads are paved with small and curiously smooth cobblestones, and from the first it was found that runners were better than wheels both for speed and comfort. For instance, when you come to a hill the ears draw your sled to the top and are then unhitched. Your driver then proceeds to toboggan your conveyance gently down the other side, while the team trots on behind. Horses are not available in Funchal, as the nature of the cobblestone roads would soon ruin their feet. This is why the ox, with his flexible hoof, is the draft animal of Funchal. For expeditions into the country the hammock is used. This is slung on a pole, carried on the shoulders of two men, and is perhaps the most comfortable conveyance in the world—no jar and no need to guide it.

A City on the Cliffs.

Precisely why the town of Bonifacio, in Corsica, is built to the sheer edge of the cliff upon which it stands a frontage of that part of the island is a question always asked by the traveler who views Bonifacio for the first time, and he reiterates his question when he observes, upon visiting the environs of the place, that there is plenty of room for the town to have spread out in the inland direction. The early Corsicans apparently thought that farm land was worth more than city real estate and they crowded their dwellings to the dizzy edge of their 200 foot precipice. One's first impression is that these houses, with their walls on a vertical plane with the cliff, were purposely so situated that the body of a victim of a dark vendetta murder might be conveniently dropped out of the window into the sea beneath, with no one the wiser. Certainly there is a suggestion of romance and mystery in the aspect of the town. It forms, at any rate, one of the oddest sky lines in the world.

Bear Hunting.

Bear hunting, with the assistance of guides supplied with a well trained pack of hounds, may be satisfactory if the trophy of the chase is desired, but it certainly is no sport and deserves not even to be ranked with trapping bears, as in the latter case the hunter must possess at least some knowledge of the quarry's habitat and habits. Unlike a fox, a bear, when once found by the hounds, stands no chance whatever of escaping, and there would be just as much sport in shooting the animals in a park or pen as to kill a bear in any bear. And, while this truth applies to mountain lions also, there is not even the excuse of the animal's destructiveness, which is applicable as far as the latter is concerned.—Field and Stream.

The Poodle.

Why is a poodle, so called? Some one says: "Probably the natural answer would recall the old lady who said that no credit could be given to Adam for naming the pig, since anybody would have known what to call it. 'Poodle' seems so obvious in English, not being found before 1804, apparently. It is the German 'pudel,' which comes from the Low German, 'pudeln,' to waddle, and the dog must have been known as Skeat says, either because he waddles after his master or because he looks fat and clumsy on account of his thick hair."

Didn't Like It.

The abhorrence of respectable British persons for the synonym for "meguinary" is almost as extraordinary as its popularity with the lower classes. In days gone by O'Connell spoke of the "bloody and brutal Whigs," and the Times in reporting him rendered it very ingeniously, with a view to exhibit his bad language, as the "base, b—— and brutal Whigs."

TELL YOUR NEIGHBOR

This week we print four pages of the opening chapters of our new story, "The Bridal Eve." This is one of Mrs. Southworth's best efforts, and is the most fascinating serial The Beaver has been able to procure for some time. The story is teeming with interesting situations, and in it is embodied a plot to defraud a young girl of her inheritance if she does not marry the scheming plotter a wayward son. To read this week's instalment will be enough, you will want the rest of it. Now is a splendid time to subscribe for The Beaver, the balance of this year and all of next year for the modest sum of $1.00. Send it to absent friends and keep them posted on home news.

MRS. WILLIAM EDGAR.

An old and much respected resident of Camden, passed away on Wednesday, Oct. 10th, at the residence of her son, Thos. Edgar, Selby. For over three months she has been confined to her bed, suffering very much, but bearing it with extraordinary patience and christian fortitude. The funeral service was held in St. John's Church, Selby, being conducted by Rev. T. E. Dowdell, who at her request had ministered to her during her illness. Mrs. Edgar was born in Scotland 78 years ago, coming to this country when quite young. Her maiden name was Jessie French. She leaves four daughters and one son to mourn her loss, but with the knowledge that a good mother had her greatest wish granted which was to depart and be with Christ. The remains were buried in Hoch cemetery on Friday, Oct. 12th.

"HELLO BILL."

George F. Hall, the well known comedian, whose visit here in the part in "The American Girl," "An American Hustler," and "A Ragged Hero," will be remembered by the Opera House audience Tuesday evening, 23rd Oct., in the new musical comedy, entitled "Hello Bill." He appears in the role of "Gerald Wilde (Bill) Bleach," who has been abroad for 15 years, and returns to a summer home with a wife whom he has married while abroad and whose identity he has concealed from his folks at home for financial reasons. He meets a daughter and housekeeper whom he does not recognize and they of course do not know of his marriage. Out of this might and a series of complications arise which grow good and thicken to such an extent that they become funny beyond appreciation. At the Bristol Opera House, Tuesday evening, 23rd Oct.

The next attraction at the Opera House will be "The College Girl," on Friday evening, 26th Oct.

RICHARD J. WRIGHT.

West Bridge st., Napanee, died quite suddenly on Thursday morning, of heart failure, aged seventy-six years. Mr. Wright was in apparently good health on Wednesday evening, and in excellent spirits, and his sudden death will be a shock to his many friends. Deceased was born in Prince Edward County, and removed to Napanee when a young man, and engaged in farming. About that time he married Miss Robertson, Johnston, who survives him. Mr. Wright was one of the best farmers in this section, and was noted for the neatness of his farm premises, and the fine thoroughbred stock which he raised. He was a man of more than average intelligence, a Liberal in politics, and a consistent member of the Methodist church. Deceased was the originator of the park on Dundas road, and when the lots were offered for sale, bought and held them until Mr. Harvey Warner took the matter in hand, and carried it to such a successful finish. Mr. Wright retired from farming about twelve years ago, and made his home in Napanee, which we understand, he has left to the widow after Mrs. Wright's death, to be used as a home for old ladies. The property is a handsome brick house, valued at $3,000. Mr. Wright was the last of a family of six brothers and sisters, five of whom are dead. He was a double cousin of Mr. Justice Clute, and is survived by an aged widow, to whom the sympathy of the community will go out. The funeral will take place from his late residence on Saturday afternoon, at 2.30. The remains will be interred in the family plot at Morven.

A SUCCESSFUL APPEAL.

The Rector and Wardens of St. Luke's Church, Camden East, appeal of Thanksgiving Day, Oct. 18th, for the $175.00 to pay off the debt on their comfortable church. The church has been tastefully decorated with autumn fruit, vegetables and potted plants. Archdeacon McMorine, D.D., Rector of St. James' Church, Kingston, preached two powerful and instructive sermons at 11 a.m. and 7.30 p.m.
The choir acquitted themselves admirably. The congregations, which were large, realized $179.78. The Treasurer, Mr. Greenwood will "tug" kept splendid accounts, and the Rector, Wardens and Vestry desire to thank the members and friends of the congregation in the neighborhood who, by their liberality, have cleared the church of debt.
The Bishop will D.V. be consecrated in June next by Bishop Mills.
Mr. and Mrs. Price, Haroldville, and Mr. Thomas Price, from Toronto, are also, Mr. and Mrs. Price, Miss Mary Price and Messrs. Roland and William Dowdle, Hinch street; Mr. D. S. O'Loughlin and E. R. Checkley, Esq., Tyler and others. Thursday, Oct. 18th, was indeed and in truth a red letter day in the annals of the parish of Camden East. Congratulatory letters were received by the Rector from Rev. A. Elliott, of Carleton Place; Archdeacon Lewis, of Brockville, former rectors of this parish.

WHERE CANADA LEADS.

American boast of the great business houses, newspapers, etc., and they are right in doing so; but Canada has a newspaper that outstrips most of the American papers, and Canadians are proud of it. We think of it. It is the spirited settled country we have. A paper that reaches 750,000 homes each week, representing 7,500,000 people. We refer to the Family Herald and Weekly Star of Montreal, the greatest family and agricultural paper on the American Continent. Its success has been well deserved for as the years go on improving and today it is worth to the farmer a value to be sold at the newspaper rate. The home without it is indeed a great deal to be pitied. It is almost indispensable. Their beautiful premium picture, "The Fairy Queen," a view worth far more than the club's subscription, will be sent to any Canadian who has the belief of our neighbors for a great newspaper success.

Robinson—You're a farmer, are you? Well, farming is a noble profession. It fills all right to call it a profession.
Farmer—Yes, thousands of men pretend to be farmers who don't know the first principles.

THE NEED OF DAY NURSERIES.

In an article on day nurseries in The New Idea Woman's Magazine for November it is asserted that "the statistics of the poor are not yet nearly over taken by the day nursery movement, although two years ago it was stated that 13,000 children were taken care of daily in the nurseries (approximately 9,000 throughout the country, and a 'day nursery map' of New York, for instance, showing fifty-seven gaps unmarked by the little red crosses which now denote a baby may not be with a tender-hearted lady, while its toiling mother turns out a day's washing or scrubbing to earn her living. From districts like these the mothers must often traverse long distances on foot by car, before they go to their day's work, to leave the baby in charge of a hurried friend, as it maybe, many nurseries are forced to close during the summer, for lack of funds and workers. There are problems with city life and the awakening of the spirit of citizenship throughout the country are among those which now appear to occupy a valuable place, being of educational and ameliorative value. And the article in question declares that of the 70,000 certificates established between the submerged classes and those of society who are comfortable, the latter seems to be sounder in principle or go more to the root of the matter than the day nursery. While insisting that homes, as the basis of society, must be kept together, it recognizes that mothers without support must needs be pauperized by charity, and must therefore go on working. It says that more fortunate mothers may spare by caring for their own children, but the dilemma between providing the means and proper care for the mother, the nursery steps in to care for the children during work, and by a small charge helps to maintain the self-respect of the mother."

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

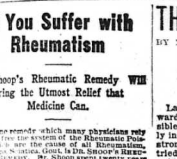
If You Suffer with Rheumatism

Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Remedy Will Bring the Utmost Relief that Medicine Can.



This one remedy which many physicians rely upon to free the system of the Rheumatic Poisons which are the cause of all Rheumatism, Lumbago, Sciatica, Gout, is Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Remedy. Dr. Shoop's seven years' research has proven that there be discovered the only combination which made possible a certain cure for Rheumatism. Not that Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Remedy claims to instantly drive out Rheumatism, for that is impossible. It will drive the poisonous uric acid from the blood into the kidneys, where it is changed to harmless salts and then passed out of the system in the urine. This remedy never fails to relieve pain and stiffness in Rheumatic joints and muscles, and it is unequaled as a remedy for Lumbago, Sciatica, Gout, Backache, Kidney Pains and Rheumatic Headache. Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Remedy is sold by druggists everywhere, or you can send your name and address to Dr. Shoop, Racine, Wis., and a free sample will be sent you by return mail. THE BRIDAL EVE

Laura Elmer felt painfully the awkwardness of her position. It was impossible to speak to him, and nearly equally indelicate to remain and witness the strong emotions that he so evidently tried to conceal.

At length, seeing him deeply absorbed in his own feelings, she softly arose, with the intention of gliding from the room, when the baronet, somehow perceiving her purpose, abruptly started forward, saying, "I beg your pardon, Miss Elmer," opened the door, and courteously held it open until she passed out.

Laura Elmer retraced her steps to the parlor, but instantly she was remembered the old condition of no lessons in the schoolroom, no drive out in the park," said Miss Lester.

Laura looked up inquiringly, and learned from the explanation that ensued that the governess was always expected to take her pupils for a daily afternoon drive in the park, and that they were now quite ready to recite their lessons and prepare for their airing.

Laura Elmer felt no sort of objection to this arrangement, and as soon, therefore, as the lessons were faithfully dispatched, the young ladies' carriage was ordered, and they drove out.

The park was, as usual at this hour of the day, filled with a brilliant crowd in open carriages of every description, intermingled with gay and noble equestrian figures. Laura Elmer enjoyed her drive through the park even more than her pupils did, since to her the scene was as new as it was interesting.

Presently—

"There is Ruthven," exclaimed Miss Lester, as a young gentleman, mounted on a spirited horse, rode up to the side of the carriage, and, lifting his hat, said:

"Well, young ladies, I hope you are enjoying your drive?"

"Excellently well" Miss Elmer, this is our elder brother, Ruthven," said Miss Lester.

The young gentleman, smiling at this very informal presentation, bowed, and hoped Miss Elmer was well, and not too much incommoded by his unmanageable sisters.

Miss Elmer reassured Mr. Lester upon that point, and, in doing so, for the first time looked at him.

He was a fine-looking young man, very much like his father, having the same tall and well-proportioned frame, though much less stout than that of the baronet; and the same dark eyes, and heavy eyebrows, and regular features surrounded by jet-black hair and whiskers, though his face was less full, and his countenance less mature, than that of the elder man. He rode beside the carriage, conversing gayly with his sisters for some time, and then suddenly inquired:

"Is her ladyship out to-day?"

"I am sure I don't know. I have not seen mamma for a week," replied Miss Lester.

"And poor Helen*" inquired the young man, lowering his voice.

"Hush! for mercy's sake! You frighten me," replied his sister, in the same low tone, and with changing cheek, and trembling voice.

The young man sighed deeply, turned and rode sadly away.

A strange, terrified silence fell upon the little party, which lasted until they returned home. After an early tea and supper they went to bed, and so to bed. And thus ended the first day of her new phase of life.

CHAPTER XI.

Ferdinand Cassinove took his way to Grosvenor Square, where he arrived at about midday. After sending in his card, he was invited to walk up into the library, and was immediately shown into the presence of Sir Vincent Lester, who arose courteously to receive him. Placing a chair for his visitor, he said:

"I answered your advertisement in the Times, Mr. Cassinove, inviting you to call upon me, because I judge that a quicker and more satisfactory arrangement might be concluded in a personal interview than through an epistolary correspondence."

Ferdinand bowed in assent, and took the offered chair.

"Should we come to terms, Mr. Cassinove, your principal charge will be the education of my son Percy, a youth of some twelve years of age. You will also be required to give lessons in Greek and Latin to my two youngest daughters. Can you undertake so extensive an inquiry?"

"Certainly, Sir Vincent. The whole task is by no means a heavy one," replied Ferdinand.

"Abundantly, Sir Vincent," replied Ferdinand, to whom the salary offered seemed to be a very liberal one.

"I have now, therefore, only to introduce you to your pupils, if you will be so kind enough to accompany me to the schoolroom. James, go before and announce us," said the baronet, rising, and leading the way.

Upon entering the schoolroom, Miss Lester said, "Master Percy were found to be its only occupants.

"Where is your governess, my dears?" inquired the baronet.

"In the music-room, giving Lucy her music lessons," replied Miss Lester, and at the same time a sweet voice was heard rehearsing some simple melody.

The baronet presented their tutor to the young people.

Cassinove had scarcely greeted his pupils when, raising his eyes, he stood face to face with the goddess of his worship—Laura Elmer.

The blood rushed to his brow, his strong frame trembled; he bowed low, to conceal the agitation he could not control.

"Miss Elmer, Mr. Cassinove, my son's new tutor," said the baronet.

"I have met Mr. Cassinove before," replied Laura, with a smile, as she offered her hand.

Ferdinand barely touched that white hand, bowed lowly over it as though it had been the hand of a queen. To him, indeed, she was ever a queen. In losing all her worldly glory, she had lost no single ray of that halo with which her noble womanhood was surrounded. Thus he bowed lowly over her hand as though it had been the hand of a queen.

"Ah, you have met before!" observed the baronet, glancing from the smiling face of Laura to the agitated countenance of Cassinove, in a tone and with a look of slight vexation as strange as it was certain.

Then, recovering his usual air of calm and stately courtesy, he said:

"But we will not further trespass upon Miss Elmer," and bowing, led the way from the schoolroom into the library.

It was arranged that the new tutor should come the next day and enter upon his duties, and Ferdinand Cassinove returned to his humble lodgings to prepare for his change of residence.

As he entered the small shop, he found Mrs. Russel wringing her hands in distress, and the two little children crying around her. The shelves were dismantled, and the drawers open and rifled.

"Why, what is the matter?" hastily inquired Cassinove, in surprise.

"Oh, Mr. Cassinove! Oh, sir!" was all that the sobbing woman could reply.

"What has occurred?" again inquired the young man.

"Oh, Mr. Cassinove! Oh, sir! and the rent due to-day!" cried the widow.

"Oh! it's an execution!" said the young man, in a tone of compassion.

"An execution? Lord, no, indeed, sir; it were only that, I might have met the worst."

"Then you have been robbed!" exclaimed Cassinove, in dismay.

"Yes, sir. While I was out, and the children left alone, a man came and said he was sent by the landlord anxious to buy all the stock. The children did not suspect him, and he helped himself to everything and drove away in a cart"

"Do you know the man?" inquired Cassinove.

"Yes"

"Who is he?"

"I dare not tell you. Oh! Mr. Cassinove, there are troubles in this world of which one must never speak, upon which no eye but that of God must ever look. Mine is such a one as that. You came in and found my house made desolate and myself and children weeping in the midst of our ruin. It is not the first time such a disaster has visited me, and it may not be the last; but if you had not come in and discovered our calamity, you never should have known it."

"But your business is for the present broken up. What can you do? And now, can I help you?"

"I thank you, Mr. Cassinove. But one thing I beg of you—say her not again of my landlord and get a little time," said the widow, gratefully.

"And who is he, Mrs. Russel?"

"Mr. Noakes, the city agent of Sir Vincent Lester, who owns this block of buildings"

"Sir Vincent Lester! Oh, I shall be able to manage the affair easily!" exclaimed Cassinove, brightening up, for he immediately resolved to pledge his salary and services in security for the widow's debt. "So you may begin to pack up as soon as you please, while I go and seek an interview with Sir Vincent Lester, he concluded, setting his hat, and hurrying away to escape the widow's fervent gratitude.

He hailed a fly, and drove immediately to Grosvenor Square, where he assisted to be admitted to Sir Vincent upon particular business.

The baronet smiled dubiously when Cassinove told his story.

"Now, what does a generous and romantic young man like yourself expect me to do in this case of the distressed widow? Doubtless you want me to play the cold and cruel proprietor, who refuses to interfere, and refers you to his hard-hearted agent, who has private instructions to show no mercy to delinquent debtors. I shall do nothing of the sort. Occasionally I drive myself the pleasure of disappointing people," he said; and, drawing towards him writing materials, he wrote a few lines on a piece of paper and handed it to Cassinove.

It was a receipt in full for the widow's rent.

"God bless and prosper you, sir!" burst impulsively from the lips of the young man, as he read this release.

"God bless and prosper us all!" said the baronet, smiling and holding out his hand.

Cassinove seized and pressed it fervently, and then left the house and hastened to carry the good news to Mrs. Russel.

He found the poor woman in the midst of her packing. He handed her the receipt, and explained to her that it was a free gift from Sir Vincent Lester.

Poor Mrs. Russel wept with gratitude. Cassinove then divided his little stock of money, and forced one-half of it upon her as a loan.

The same afternoon Mrs. Russel found another little house in an obscure part of the city, to which, upon the next day, she removed.

Cassinove, who had remained helping her to the last, finally bade her adieu, as he handed her into the cab that was to convey her and her children to their new home. Then he entered the fly that he had kept in waiting, and was driven to Grosvenor Square, to commence his new career as a private tutor.

He was received by the baronet, who courteously installed him in a spacious closet adjoining the library, that had been fitted up as a study for himself and his pupil.

He was informed that he should dine at two o'clock with Master Percy, the little ladies and their governess, and that this party were expected always to take their meals together in the sitting-room adjoining the little ladies' schoolroom.

Oh, joy! he would then be sure of meeting Laura Elmer at least three times a day. How much toil would he not be willing to undergo for the delight of seeing Laura Elmer thrice a day!

Accordingly, at two o'clock they met at dinner. It was but a little party of five. Laura, the little girls, Cassinove and Percy. No young gentleman first ordained and unique for the credit of his cloth could have been more circumspect in manner, looks and conversation than Ferdinand Cassinove.

And, as Laura Elmer observed him, his face appeared to her to be strangely intimate. She wondered where, and under what circumstances of extreme interest they could have been, that she had seen that noble face before. She recollected perfectly of having seen him at Swinburne Castle, in attendance upon Colonel Hastings; but that was not the scene that continued so vaguely, yet so persistently, haunting her imagination like some half-remembered dream. Suddenly the circumstances of the past rushed in full upon her mind. It was the dream that she had had the first night she had slept in Lester House—the dream in which a man, bearing Cassinove's form and features, had been ever at her side, through scenes of transcendent beauty, brightness and joy, and whose hand had at last replaced upon her brow the lost coronet of Swinburne. Laura Elmer, as she recollected this fantastic dream, smiled at the vagaries of imagination that had mixed up the personality of her guardian's amanuensis with the wild vision of a restless night, and she drew no auguries from it. She looked up again at the face to read there that it was that had caused it so to haunt her dreams; and, as she raised her eyes, she chanced to meet those of Cassinove fixed full upon her face. Both dropped their eyes, blushing deeply, as with a sudden consciousness; and soon after Miss Elmer gave the signal for rising from the table.

Cassinove and his pupil retired, and Laura and her young ladies passed to the adjoining schoolroom.

Laura had scarcely seated herself among her pupils before a servant appeared with a request from Sir Vincent that Miss Elmer would grant him a few minutes' conversation in the drawing-room.

Laura immediately arose and went thither. She found Sir Vincent pacing up and down the floor, with signs of extreme disturbance upon his face and manner. He came immediately to meet her, took her hand, led her to a chair, and, seating himself near her, said, with much empressement:

"My dear Miss Elmer, I have taken the liberty of requesting your presence here to-day, for the purpose, with your kind permission, of making you a confidant, and asking you a favor."

Laura bowed and waited his further words.

"In your first interview with me, in this room, you must have observed a young lady of singular appearance, who came in for a moment and when I met and led out again."

"Yes sir, I observed her."

"Did you—I beg you will forgive the question, Miss Elmer—but did you notice anything remarkable about this lady?" inquired the baronet, with interest.

"I noticed her extreme pallor, which, perhaps, seemed so ghastly only by contrast to her jet-black hair and eyes, and her black dress. I noticed, also, a deep melancholy, approaching to despair in the expression of her features, and a sort of restrained frenzy in her glances and motions. I saw her but for an instant, but in that instant I will not deny that her appearance impressed me very deeply."

"Humph! humph!" muttered the baronet to himself. "Is a dubious tone, from which it was impossible to judge whether he approved or disapproved of the interest expressed by Miss Elmer in the person alluded to.

"Miss Elmer, your appearance and manner, no less than the high encomiums of my friend, Dr. Seymour, give me the greatest faith in your prudence and benevolence."

Laura bowed in silence.

The baronet seemed embarrassed, and doubted how to proceed.

At length he said:

A Message to Those Threatened with Lung Trouble

For the benefit of all persons who have a predisposition to Consumption, either inherited or contracted by exposure, unsuitable employment or other cause, we make this positive declaration, and stake our reputation upon its accuracy: If they will faithfully take FERROL three times a day, as per directions, it is impossible for the threatened disease to develop. Further, even in cases where the lungs are actually involved, provided the trouble is not too deeply seated, will arrest the disease and repair the waste already committed.

These statements are based on the common sense theory that FERROL contains, in perfect combination, the Oil, Iron and Phosphorus which alone can actually nourish the wasting tissue, enrich the impoverished blood and tone up the relaxed nerves.

Thousands have put this theory to the test of actual practice, and not one has been disappointed.

FERROL is pleasant to take and is so scientifically prepared that it is ready for instant absorption, so that, even where the digestion is weak, no difficulty is experienced in assimilating it. Moreover, FERROL is the only Cod Liver Oil preparation that may be taken with advantage during the summer months.

WELL DRESSED NAPANEE MEN

Lean on Robinson's for Perfection in Ready-to-Wear Clothing.

With us the study of Men's styles is a business, and all the more keenly coned because it means so much to us in dollars and cents. Mistakes are expensive, therefore we endeavor to make no mistakes. You put twenty-five, fifty, one hundred or two hundred dollars a year in clothes. We put thousands of dollars. Isn't it natural that we should be sure we're right before going ahead?

Handsome Models for Men.

Among the men's suits we have some very handsome models:

Single breasted 3 button sacks with and without vents, loose backs, also slightly fitted backs.

Also double breasted sack suits, large graceful lapels, generous front with well spaced buttons.

Sale of Black Sheer Materials.

Thursday, Nov. 1st.

LENGTHS—FOR SKIRTS, WAISTS and DRESSES.

Now here is a bargain in the most fashionable dress color of the day "black" and in materials and weaves that are in strongest demand. Next Thursday, Nov. 1st, commencing at ten o'clock, we will have cut off in waist, skirt and dress lengths such weaves as Crepe De Chenes Eoliennes, Voiles, Etamines. Each length will have ticket attached showing quantity and sale price. Now in a sale like this where every piece is measured up there need be no delay. They will be spread out on counter, prices are plainly marked and sale price will be low enough to pay you well for making an early trip down town. Time—10 o'clock, Thursday, Nov. 1st.

Dress Trimming House.

It goes without saying that we show, handle, sell and use right here in Napanee more high class dress trimming than any other town on the line. Any traveller will tell you that Napanee gowns are noted for their style. The Robinson Co. are largely responsible. Good dressmaking and rich trimmings has always been a feature with us. It is a pleasure for us to show our new trimmings and a treat for any woman to look at them.

Women's Stylish Black Coats.

Good taste does not approve of too much sameness in coat styles. Not one style has full sway. Our selections are all based on becomingness. We have studied becomingness for slim or full figures, for very short or very tall women. Becomingness for matronly women too. That accounts for us showing so many styles. Because our styles are right does not mean that you must pay a high price. Good looking Black Coats from $7.90 to $20.00. All sizes from 32 in. bust to 48 in. bust. Let us show you now while we have most variety.

Ladies' Neckwear in Fur Ruffs, Stoles, Ties.

We feel safe in saying that in no town in Canada will you find such a complete range of ladies' fur neckwear as we are showing this season, and as for value, well, you will have to come and see, as we can't do justice to the subject in words.

ALASKA SABLE. This class of fur is as popular as ever, and our range is complete at 8.50, 10.00, 12.50, 15.00, 18.00, 20.00, 25.00, 35.00, 50.00

COON SABLE. We give you a very large ruff at 8.50, and an extra size and quality of 12.50 and 20.00.

NATURAL BADGER. The badger fur makes a very attractive appearance, and we have them in large stoles at 12.50. Muffs to match at 6.00.

NATURAL GRAY LYNX Stoles at 20.00, muff to match at 15.00.

PERSIAN LAMB TIE. The thrown over tie for street wear is gaining in popularity each season, and for 22.50 the Persian Lamb makes a handsome appearance. Muff to match at 17.00.

BLENDED MUSKRAT Set at 19.00.

NATURAL CANADIAN MINK. Our Mink this season is of a very select quality, and our stoles at 65.00 are without doubt exceptional value. A dark muff fine stripes to match stole at 50.00.

SABLE or ISABELLA FOX. A great many of our customers are taking special note of the quality in Fox, which we are showing this year. We have a large ruff at 22.50, and one with the large head at 12.50. Muff to match at 12.50.

To meet the demand for a cheaper neck fur we have imported from Scotland a large assortment of Hare, Coney and Marmot, at prices from 1.75 to 10.00.

We give you a cordial invitation to visit our Fur Department, and will consider it a pleasure to show you what we have.

Xmas is coming. Do you wish us to lay away any Furs for you?

"OLD BLEACH"

The Aristocracy of Towels

AND A "SPECIAL."

There is one great Irish Linen Company so sure of the excellence of their weaves, so safe in the world wide reputation they have won, that they do not let even their towels go out as other towels do, in unrecognizable pairs or dozens. Their trade mark "Old Bleach" is stamped on every towel. If no name it isn't "Old Bleach", depend on that.

In first place the "Old Bleach" Linens are made of pure flax only. All are grass bleach. They make from plain huckaback towels to the most expensive Damask towels in the world. We are their selling agents for Napanee and can procure to order any designs they make. We carry in stock only qualities up to $2.25 a pair.

Special.

About a year ago we sold for advertising purposes about 20 doz. of Old Bleach plain hemstitched towels, 20 in. by 38 1-2 in. huckaback weave at 25 cents each. We will sell another lot same quality, next Tuesday, Oct. 30th, at same price. See window.

Whenever you touch this linen store, you find sturdy, honest, good value. (Xmas is coming)

Black Dress Goods.

Black is again in vogue, the richest color that most women can affect. Buy at a safe store—the color is half the glory. We have no place for "off" Blacks, and any black that is not up to our idea of a perfect black is not allowed in stock. England, France, Germany have contributed to our splendid stock. Plain weaves have the preference over fancies. If out of town let us send you samples. If you want us to make your dress better speak for time at once.

Fair Prices for Millinery.

Used to be that milliners gave a twist and a twirl to a few things, called the result a hat, and asked $10.00 for it. To-day, and The Robinson Co. are to be thanked for the change, there is real value given in millinery. You can pick a hat to pieces and see why it costs a given price. Our range of styles is large enough to do big business without sameness too.

LEATHER GOODS FOR XMAS TRADE.

We have gone into the Leather Goods very extensively. With only a few exceptions every piece we have is just fresh from the factory. When we sell you leather you may depend upon it being leather. If you wish to select now for Xmas we will be pleased to reserve any piece you may select. Purses, Hand Bags, Music Rolls, Collar Boxes, Card Cases, Glove and Handkerchief Cases.

FARMERS' GOOSE FEATHER PILLOWS.

We have just received a few pairs of real good feather pillows. They were picked, cured and cased by people we knew were reliable. For sale now in our bedding section in pairs or singles just as you please.

A Japanese Window of Silks.

One window is used this week to display some of our Japanese Silks. When Japanese silks are good they are extra good. We are in touch with a Japanese Silk Importer that knows when and how to buy Japanese silks. We have no hesitation in recommending every piece we get from him. Think of us when you want Real Art Silks for Kimonas, Dressing Jackets, Cushions or separate Waists and Dresses. And for waist patterns beautifully hand embroidered in the daintiest designs. Such as sky on white, white on black, black on white, all white, all black.

The Place to Buy Knitting Yarns.

We now have in a full stock of yarns in 2, 3 and 4 ply. Black, white, grey and mottled (factory) 2 ply, 15c skein, 60c lb.

Cardinal, blue and pink (Saxony) 18c bunch. Shetland floss mail shades, 7c bunch, or 3 for 20c.

THE ROBINSON CO'Y.

LIMITED.

PROGRESS BRAND CLOTHING

The Overcoat Proposition

A great many men wear the three-quarter length Overcoat. They prefer it, as the style changes but little from season to season, and it looks as well on the tall man or the short man as on the normal figure.

It's An Ideal Coat

The cut of this coat this season is a trifle longer than usual and more form fitting.

The collar and lapels are wider and longer. Meltons and Beavers in Black and Oxford mixtures are the favorite fabrics. We want men who enjoy a sensible overcoat to see these three-quarter length coats.

Overcoats range from $7.50 and $10.00 up to $16.00.

We would like to meet the man who who is looking about for the best overcoat his money can buy.

Splendid Tweed Suits for Men and Boys

We have never been so well satisfied with our Fall and Winter Suits as we are this season. Good manufacturers of "Ready-to-wear" Clothing are making vast strides—and every season shows marked improvement. We are showing an immense range of splendid tweed suits in all the latest patterns and styles—single or double breasted. Mens Suits start as low as $5.00 and run as high as $14.00. Boys' Suits run from $3.00 to $7.50.

We want you to see our Men and Boys' Clothing before making your fall purchases. You will find our prices very reasonable — quality and style considered. We guarantee our clothing, and if anything bought at our store does not give entire satisfaction — let us know it and we will make it right.

STRATHCONA.

The sad drowning of Dennis McGuire cast a gloom over this place, where he was so well known. He met his death in the river at Newburgh some time Friday night. No one knows how it happened, but supposes he must have fallen in the darkness. The body was discovered the following morning. After the inquest the remains were prepared for burial and conveyed to the home of his brother, Mr. James McGuire. On Monday the funeral took place at the R.C. church, Centreville.

Mrs. John Boyer spent a few days at Belleville last week.

A SPIRITUAL HARVEST

LAW OF CAUSE AND EFFECT WORKS HERE.

NO WORTHY EFFORT WASTED

By Faith Sower of the Seed Sees His Future Harvest—So May Men and Women Who Work to Win Souls for Christ and Right Living—Reward of the Kindly Effort is Sure and Certain.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1905, by Frederick Dixon, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 21.—In this sermon, using the familiar type of the seed sower, the preacher shows that no worthy effort at winning men and women from sin is ever wasted, but is rewarded by a spiritual harvest. The text is Ecclesiastes xi., 1, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

This text has been impressed on my mind ever since I journeyed around the world and came home by the land of the pharaohs. When I wandered amid the ancient ruins and stood under the shadows of its obelisks and pyramids and reflected that all these temples and palaces and monuments and tombs were the relics of the ancient race which, by reason of the fertility of the land lying along the banks of the river Nile, these words have had for me a complete fascination, for in the light of Egyptian lore I thought King Solomon was alluding to the custom with which the descendants of the ancient subjects of the Remeses are wont to sow their seed. That country is very interesting to a traveler from this hemisphere, Egypt is a vast desert. From one end of the year to the other no rain falls on that parched soil. How, then, is the land cultivated? By the river Nile, which, when the spring freshets flow into it, rises above its banks and overflows the low lying lands on each side. Then, as the river Nile dries up again, most of the overflowing water is drawn back into the original channel and leaves the adjacent regions under a layer of thick mud, with here and there small shallow ponds and pools. Then the Egyptian farmer goes forth and scatters his seeds upon this slimy matter. The seeds sink into the mud. They take root. Then, when the harvest time comes, the lands alongside of the Nile are covered with luxuriant crops.

In light of this strange custom of Egyptian agriculture I used to say to myself, "Ah, I know what King Solomon meant when he said, 'Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days.' He is practically saying: 'Pick out your richest grounds. Go up to the rich mud-covered fields by the Nile. Drop here a seed and there a seed of God-given teaching. By and by sower find these seeds will die. You harvests will soon yield their thirty, their sixty, their hundredfold. The ground is so rich that it is certain to bring forth a harvest." Thus I would explain the injunction to sow broadcast by using this injunction as casting his seed upon rich soil and then in a few months shifting his tents and caravanseries with his wagons laden with the heavy golden sheaves which he had harvested for his Master.

That is a very beautiful vision which I had about the message of my text. There was only one trouble about it. The vision was not true. When I began to look up what the Bible scholars said about this text I found that they made no allusion to the river Nile and the vast muddy banks, with their mud filled with the sowers' seeds. According to Thomas Scott, this text alludes to the Palestine farmer and not to the Egyptian. It pictures a Palestine farmer scattering the seed over his fields and coming to a swampy region. It is the poorest part of his farm. He has never cultivated it before, because, when he came to it, he always said: "What is the use of my planting there? I will never get any return for my labor. My seed will only rot and never bring me back any sheaves." But Solomon says: "O farmer, go to the most unpromising parts of the farm. Scatter your good seeds amid the swampy soils, where gnats and all good people are skeptical about getting any harvest. Your gospel seeds will never be useless. By throwing them there harvests will come. Believe me, the seeds will come." Let me read to you his very words, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days." Could we have more practical advice for Christian work?

Think of it! One of the richest fields God is here telling us to sow in the most undesirable ones. Now, as I begin to rub over some of the most unpromising regions for gospel seed planting, my mind in the first place naturally turns toward the child who is born of dissolute or degraded parents. "Oh," you say as you look at him, "there is no use wasting anything upon that boy! He was born of a bad mother. His father was divorced from her on account of her flagrant sins. She is never at home. You might as well try to change a leopard's spots as to reconcile the parental fact 'is his blood.'" Or you say: "What is the use? That boy's father is a drunkard and an infidel. He daily scoffs at the Bible. Any good seed we might sow in that child's heart would be rooted out in a night by the ridicule of his father's talk. Yes, I understand, but I know how discouraged you are over that boy. But do not despair. Go on sowing your gospel seed in that child's heart whenever you have an opportunity. Christ will look after the result. Your gospel harvests in that life will surely come. Do you not recall the divine promise given to us by the declaration, 'Cast thy bread upon the waters?' That means "Cast thy seed on the most unpromising fields, for thou shalt find it after many days."

And why should we not cast the gospel seed into the child heart? Have you a right to say that any child cannot be led to Christ until you have tried to lead him there not only seven times, but seventy times seven? A child's heart seems to me like the desert of Arizona. Now, there are two kinds of desert. There is the desert of sand and rock, like that of Arizona. You might as well expect a dotted sieve to hold water as such a desert. You can pour rivers upon rivers into it and there will never any shower descend upon it, and those waters will almost instantly disappear. It would take centuries upon centuries of inundations to change the Sahara sands into the rich soil of a harvest field.

But such a desert as that is not to be compared to the Arizona desert. There the lands are rich beyond all human computation in all the elements that are essential to develop vegetable life. You could grow wheat there. You could grow corn there. You could grow orchards there. You could grow the most exquisite of flowers there, if you only had water. Travelers will tell you that when the short rainy season comes to the Arizona desert it will be literally covered with wild flowers, and the forest of grasses will spring up as if by magic. Thus I feel when I look off upon the unpromising, wicked, sinful children. There I do not find rocky hearts, stony hearts, flinty hearts, which cannot be touched by the gospel seed. But, like the Arizona plains, I find rich soil just ready for the gospel showers. Give the child a chance to live. Sow the gospel seed in the homes where the parental life is not what it should be. Christ will find them, and the harvest will surely come for his glory. Have you any doubt that God's promises are true? "Cast thy bread upon the unpromising fields, and thou shalt find it after many days."

Let me open for a moment the door of your home. For whom are you chiefly living? I think you will confess it is for your children. You say to your wife: "No, Mary; I will not allow that. The children must not go." But after the supper is over your little daughter climbs up into your lap and begins to talk. The first thing you know you have not only consented for her to do what you said she might not do, but you have promised her that you take you along. "Oh, John," your wife says, "those babies can never run about their little farms. You have no mind of your own when they are about." Your answer is: "Not at all; you never find them those seeds will die. You harvests will soon yield their thirty, their sixty, their hundredfold. The ground is so rich that it is certain to bring forth a harvest." Thus I would apply the injunction to sow broadcast by using this injunction as casting his seed upon rich soil and then in a few months shifting his tents and caravanseries with his wagons laden with the heavy golden sheaves which he had harvested for his Master.

it if I could; but, alas, my hand is not clean! I will pass it to my prime minister." The prime minister's hand was not clean, so he passed it to the governor of the citadel. The governor's hand was not clean, and he passed it to the high priest. The high priest's hand was not clean, and he passed it on to another.

Thus the golden seed went from hand to hand. Then the thief said, "Your majesty, if no man's hand is clean, why should I alone die for the crime?" "You are right," said the king. "If you are to die, then I must die also." Then the conscience-stricken king pardoned the culprit because he and his officers were all sinners alike. It is the story a mere legend, a fable? I think not. We say certain men are degraded and beyond the pale of gospel hope. Are they? Are our own hands morally clean? Have we always been pure? Have we never sinned? Are we not sinning now? Oh, my Lord and my God, if thou canst save us, the chief of sinners, canst thou not save even the lowest and the vilest with whom we come in contact in our daily life? Yes, even the vilest and the vilest the Lord Jesus can save. "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

But the next unpromising field for gospel seed planting to which my mind turns naturally is the bitter hearts of the unregenerate. Many and many have been identified with Christian works, whose labors were unappreciated by their contemporaries and who have been cast out, or, rather, frozen out, of the churches with which they were identified. Some of these men and women now are among the most bitter of all enemies of the churches. There are hundreds and thousands of men and women who despise the church of God because some Christian friend or some church has proved false to them. They despise the church of God, which they once have loved, because some man or body of men has been unappreciative of their loyalty and self-sacrifice. Now, my friend, it is your duty and my duty to go after these delinquent church members. We must go after them. We must harness them up to the gospel chariot again and get them to pull. I know it will be hard work to bring them back. I know it is an unpromising field for gospel seed planting, but if we go forth in the right spirit to the right gospel sowing we can get a harvest even in this unpromising soil. Remember the words of my text, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days."

But, many I think of one of the most sacred of all fields in which to sow the gospel seed. That is the stony, heart of the sinner. Which of us, upon searching of his conscience by accepting a religion or a creed which will allow him to live as he pleases, or by accepting one not feel that he is doing wrong. And these liberal religions or false creeds are flourishing everywhere. There are at least one of them will satisfy almost any condition of sinful life and almost any degree of evil practice and will allow you to yield to all your desires and appetites. Some will let you do all these things and yet be saved. Some will let you do the most sinful things and no need of my going into details. I mean the creed which will allow a man to be a drunkard, to live with one wife and children and start a social community where he can defy the domestic laws and where the laws of purity are so liberal, so utterly lax, that they will allow men to do almost anything they will. Now, how are we to fight against the sins of these men and women who profess the gladdings of conscience by false creeds? Simply by gospel seed planting. I know the stony hearts of these transgressors are unpromising for a rich harvest, but remember God's seeds can bring forth their hundredfold harvest even in places where you may think a gospel sheaf can never be gathered.

But I cannot close without asking this one pertinent question: Is it not a fact, after all, my brother, that the reason you have not been a gospel sower in the unpromising fields of life is because you do not hold the gospel seed in your own hand? What is the good of a field and a sower if that sower has no seed to sow? Friend, why are your hands empty? Is it because thou hast not yet been consecrated to the service of Jesus Christ? Will thou accept one of God's powers to-day and equip thyself for the work of his holy spirit? Will thou fill thy empty hands by taking the bin of God's promises and bring them up full, and then plant the first in your own stony heart, and then scatter them over the fields of the neighbors' hearts? May God help me as I now take a handful of his everlasting promises. May I lift these promises as gospel seeds and go up and down among my friends and say: "Friend, this seed is for thee. This seed is for thee." Will thou receive these gospel seeds and plant them in

IMP OF INDIGESTION.

HOW TO GET THE BETTER OF THIS CAUSE OF MISERY.

A scientific writer says: "If you have suffered from indigestion,—and who has not?—your imagination has probably pictured a ferocious little imp as living in the pit of your stomach, and that organ to neglect all of its duties with a result that is only painful, but fills you with misery from top to toe. This writer certainly had the right word with indigestion, for how many make disagreeable, nervous wrecks—only dyspeptics.

A great many people who are constantly troubled with sick headache, heart, liver or kidneys, when in fact stomach disorder is the cause, only did Mona cure the stomach, and the other troubles would disappear.

If you suffer with sleeplessness, indigestion, sick headache, pain in the back, get a 50c box of Mona from any druggist. All at close prices for cash.

Pandora Range

SAVES FUEL AND HELPS TO PAY FOR ITSELF.

It is not the price you pay for a range which makes it cheap or expensive, but the fuel it consumes after you get it.

If you buy a range which costs $5 to $7 less than a "Pandora" and it burns a ton, or only half a ton of coal more in a year, what do your gain? Nothing, but you actually lose money, besides putting up with all the inconveniences, troubles and extra work which are a certainty with a poor range.

The "Pandora" is equipped with many fuel-saving features which are not found on any other range. Hot-air flues are constructed so that all the heat from the fire-box travels directly under every pot-hole and around the oven twice—every atom of heat is used, and only the smoke goes up the chimney.

Sold by all enterprising dealers. Booklet free.

Who Gets the Most Out of Life?

Not the wealthiest, not the most learned, nor the idler—but the man who has good health and works for his living. This truth is trite, but not trivial.

Every man should guard his health as his most valuable possession. The more so because health is easier to retain than regain.

Keep your grip on health by regular exercise, reasonable care in eating and requisite sleep. Take Beecham's Pills occasionally, to tone the stomach and keep the liver and bowels in good working order. And don't worry.

Observe these simple rules and you will agree that the one who gets the most from life is

They Never Knew Failure. — Careful observation of the effects of Parmelee's Vegetable Pills has shown that they act immediately on the diseased organs of the system and stimulate them to healthy action. There may be cases in which the disease has been long seated and does not easily yield to medicine, but even in such cases these pills have been known to bring relief when all other so-called remedies have failed. These assertions can be substantiated by many who have used the pills, and medical men speak highly of their qualities.

It is said of a noted Virginia Judge that on a pinch he always came out ahead. An incident of his childhood might go to prove this.

"Well, Benny," said his father when the lad had been gone to school about a month, "what did you learn to-day?"

"About the mouse, father."

"Spell mouse?"

After a little pause, Benny answered, "Father, I don't believe it was a mouse after all; it was a rat."

A Purely Vegetable Pill.—Parmelee's Vegetable Pills are compounded from such herbs as could extract of known virtue in the treatment of liver and kidney complaints and in giving tone to the system whether enfeebled by overwork or deranged through excesses in living. They require no test monials. Their excellent qualities are well known to all those who have used them and they command confidence to dyspeptics and these suffering with biliousness who are in quest of a beneficial medicine.

Bee-Marriage is a pottery.

Sea—You mean a lottery, don't you?

Bee—No, I mean a pottery—a place for making family jars.

Where Weakness is, Disease Will Settle.—If you suffer from any sort of stomach weakness, inherited or contracted, there disease will settle when it gets a favorable opportunity. Therefore drive out the germs that breed you, do not wait old or a cough becomes you, and keep the respiratory organs in a good healthy condition. This you can do by using Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil. Perfect on the first trial.

An American visiting Dublin told some startling stories about the negro of some of the New York tenements. An Irishman who was listening stood it as long as he could, and then quelled.

"It haven't seen our newest hotel, have ye?"

The American thought not.

"Well," said the Irishman, "it's so tilt that we had to put two or two stories on blocks."

"What for?" asked the American.

"So we wouldn't see down till the moon went by," said Pat.

Cholera and all summer complaints are easy to control, but when the cold hand of death is upon the victims before they are aware that danger is near it attacks do not delay in getting the proper remedy. Try a dose of Dr. J. D. Kellogg's Dysentery Cordial, and you will get immediate relief. It acts with wonderful rapidity and never fails to effect a cure.

"The evidence shows, Mr. Mulcahey, that you threw a stone at Policeman Casey."

"It shows more than that, yer Honon, it shows that Oi hit him."

These two desirable qualifications, that is the taste and at the same time effectual, are to be found in Mother Graves' Worm Exterminator, Children like it.

"It is strange how some people cry at weddings."

"Yes, but you've probably noticed that it's never the single people who cry."

"Well sir—"

"Well, it is only the married ones who realize the tragedy of it."

When all other corn preparations fail, try Holloway's Corn Cure. Is pain whatever, and no inconvenience in using it.

Sea—You mean a lottery, don't you?

Bee—No, I mean a pottery—a place for making family jars.

Where Weakness is, Disease Will Settle.—If you suffer from any sort of stomach weakness, inherited or contracted, there disease will settle when it gets a favorable opportunity. Therefore drive out the germs that breed you, do not wait old or a cough becomes you, and keep the respiratory organs in a good healthy condition. This you can do by using Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil. Perfect on the first trial.

An American visiting Dublin told some startling stories about the negro of some of the New York tenements. An Irishman who was listening stood it as long as he could, and then quelled.

"It haven't seen our newest hotel, have ye?"

The American thought not.

"Well," said the Irishman, "it's so tilt that we had to put two or two stories on blocks."

"What for?" asked the American.

"So we wouldn't see down till the moon went by," said Pat.

Cholera and all summer complaints are easy to control, but when the cold hand of death is upon the victims before they are aware that danger is near it attacks do not delay in getting the proper remedy. Try a dose of Dr. J. D. Kellogg's Dysentery Cordial, and you will get immediate relief. It acts with wonderful rapidity and never fails to effect a cure.

"The evidence shows, Mr. Mulcahey, that you threw a stone at Policeman Casey."

"It shows more than that, yer Honon, it shows that Oi hit him."

These two desirable qualifications, that is the taste and at the same time effectual, are to be found in Mother Graves' Worm Exterminator, Children like it.

"It is strange how some people cry at weddings."

"Yes, but you've probably noticed that it's never the single people who cry."

"Well sir—"

"Well, it is only the married ones who realize the tragedy of it."

When all other corn preparations fail, try Holloway's Corn Cure. Is pain whatever, and no inconvenience in using it.

"Don't Use Too Much"

Armour's Solid Extract of Beef

(COTTED IN CANADA)

Be careful not to use too great a proportion of Armour's Beef Extract when making Beef Tea, Soups, or Gravies. Too much does not improve your dishes. Just add one-quarter the quantity you would of other Extracts and Fluid Beefs, because Armour's has four times the strength of most of them.

Mrs. Jas. Bennie has improved the appearance of his home by a coat of paint.

The Waiter—Slow do you wish your bacon cooked, sir?

The Farmer—Does it make any difference in the price?

The Waiter—No, no sir.

The Farmer—Then by gosh, I'll have it cooked with three legs.

Meeky—Yes, we're going to move to Swampville next week.

Hector—But the climate there may disagree with your wife.

Meeky—It wouldn't dare!

End of day in ordinary fatiguing shoes

WON'T TIRE YOU

IMPROVEMENT NUMBER FIFTEEN

You can't stand in one position five minutes without tiring. You can't be long in a plaster jacket without tiring. You can't ride many hours in a train without tiring. And you can't walk any distance or stand any time in hard, stiff, rigid, shapeless, ordinary shoes without tiring. Why? Because anything that confines the muscles and hinders or impedes freedom of muscular action produces fatigue. Want to know how tiring your ordinary shoes are? Well, just pull them off after a strenuous day and note the soothing, relieving, refreshing sensation that creeps over the body.

Foot-rites are built with six ingenious devices to give the feet absolute liberty of muscle action, viz:

With Plumb-Line Level Heel and Sole to keep heel and ball on the precise level Nature intended, which gives foot bottom freedom.

With Unwrapable Soles to insure the feet lying free and flat instead of pinched and curled up.

With Toe-Freedom, Uncollapsable Box Toes to allow the toes barefoot freedom.

With Hurtless Instep Seams and "Won't Blister" Hooks and Eyes to promote freedom in the uppers.

With "Normal-Calf," almost as soft and supple a the calf's live skin, to provide a pliant, yielding, freedom-loving canopy over the feet. And with Easy Insoles, formed exactly the same size and shape as the feet which inhabit them, to eliminate pinching, squeezing and binding and give the foot muscles free, unconfined, natural action. These insoles are produced by Foot-rite Foot-Sculptured Lasts.

The Foot-rite retailer in your town will prove the free muscle action feature and consequent "Won't Tire You" improvement of Foot-rites, if you'll call on him. You'll find his name below and his door swinging inward but never outward to find a more welcome store.

Anywhere, in America, Canada or Great Britain—$4.00 and $5.00. Every pair Goodyear Welted.

Baking Powder While You Wait

At Wallace's Red Cross Drug Store. We make Baking Powder while you wait. It's really the only way to buy your powder, that is if you are particular as to quality and want it fresh. Let us make you 25 cents worth the next time you need some.

WELCOME TO OUR SHOW.

Visitors are cordially invited to call and inspect our goods. Our stock is extensive and varied. A nice line of souvenirs and fancy articles suitable for presents on hand at very low prices. Everything up to date at WILSON'S OLD STAND, next J. F. Smith's Grocery.

Only One Drug Store.

If you knew or felt sure that you could go to a Drug Store and get the very best drugs, or the very best tooth brush, hair brush or hot water bottle, etc., and that your prescription would be just as carefully compounded as it could possibly be by competent dispensers, and that you would be just as cheerfully served and as courteously treated when making a two cent purchase as when making a two dollar one, would you not always deal at that store? Would there not be only one drug store as far as you would be concerned? Wallace's Red Cross Drug Store "IS THAT STORE".

A SEASON'S ATTRACTION.

We beg to announce to our citizens that a most helpful and educational club has been organized by our music-loving ladies called The Napanee Ladies' Musical Club, one well worthy of the patronage of all who desire to be benefited by the study of music in its different branches. Its motive is to increase the interest in music among the ladies, giving them an incentive to put to practical use their talent, with the assurance of the absence of criticism. Its literature will be also studied, and altogether many of the subjects in turn importance and interest. As the club comprises three kinds of members—honorary, active and associate—I would request all who feel they will be interested in its work. It will meet every two weeks on Saturday afternoons at 3.30 o'clock in the Town Hall. Initiation fee is one dollar.

WOUNDS, BRUISES AND BURNS.

By applying the antiseptic healing oil to wounds, bruises, burns and like injuries before inflammation sets in, they may be healed without maturation and in about one-third the time required by the old treatment. This is the greatest discovery and triumph of modern surgery. Chamberlain's Pain Balm acts on this same principle. It is an antiseptic and when applied to such injuries, causes them to heal very quickly. It also allays the pain and soreness and prevents any danger of blood poisoning. Keep a bottle of Pain Balm in your home and it will save you time and money, not to mention the inconvenience and suffering such injuries entail. For sale at The Red Cross Drug Store. 40d

BONNIE BRIER BUSH.

A treat is in store for all lovers of a good clean play, at the Opera House next Friday night, 2d Nov. It is seldom that a company with the reputation this one possesses, visits Napanee, and it is sure to be greeted with a crowded house. The Ottawa Free Press says:

That always welcome story of the Scottish hills "The Bonnie Brier Bush," was presented at the Russell yesterday, matinee and night, to audiences which tested the capacity of the theatre.

The company which is a large and capable one gives a delightful performance of the play. Chas. E. Bloomer as "Posy" as delight. Miss Reynolds as Flora Campbell unites beauty with great dramatic ability and is easily the superior of any of her predecessors in the role. David Davies as Lachlan Campbell puts force and strength into his scenes and shows more than the ordinary ability. The same can be said of Mrs. Warren as Annie. Miss Cowan as Margaret and Kenneth Mackenzie as Tammas were easily recognizable as being natives of Auld Scotland, and Robert Ireland did exceedingly well as Robert McClure. The two Bennet children are clever in their roles. Maurice Savigne is good as Rev. John Carmichael and Mr. Labey gives the proper dignity to the part Earl Kilspindle. A young actor who is sure of recognition is Leonard Howe, who gives a really finished portrayal as Lord Howe. A delightful feature of the performance is the singing of the male quartette.

SUCCESS WITH CARPETS

Our Carpet Business this season is bigger than we had ever hoped for, and the natural inference is that qualities and values are best here. People don't, as a rule, buy Carpets haphazard. The patterns are exclusive and selected with rare taste and judgment. Such delightful originality needs to be looked at and known before making up your mind where to spend your Carpet money. No need to magnify our facilities for showing you the new Carpets. There isn't a lighter, more adaptable Show Room in Central Ontario. Plenty of room and light helps one in a choice, and you get what you think you're getting every time.

Carpets, Rugs, Draperies, Curtains, Linoleums, and Oilcloths.

To the Electors of Ernestown Township.

Ladies and Gentlemen,—On account of the late Government Act in reference to County Councils being composed of the Township Council, I beg leave to offer my services as Reve for 1907. There will be no more County Councillors—each township, as I understand it, will send the Reeve to the County Council. Each township having more than 1000 voters will send two representatives to the Council. Ernestown will furnish two men as we have about 1165 names. Soliciting your vote and influence, I remain Yours truly,

L. GALLAGHER.

October 8th, 1906.

HEALING PROPERTIES OF WATER.

There is no remedy so easily obtained as water, and yet nine persons out of ten will pass it by at an emergency to seek for something of less efficacy. There are but few cases of illness where water should not occupy the highest place as a remedial agent. A strip of flannel or a napkin folded lengthwise and wrung out of hot water, and applied around the ear of a child who has croup will usually bring relief in a few minutes. A towel, folded several times, then quickly wrung out of hot water and immediately laid over the seat of the pain in toothache or neuralgia will afford prompt relief. For inflammation in colic works like magic. Cases on record having resisted other treatment for hours have yielded to this treatment in ten minutes.

Pieces of cotton batting dipped in hot water, then applied to all sores and new cuts, bruises and sprains relieve immediately and cause them to heal quickly. Hot water taken freely before, now before asthma is at its worst, is an excellent cathartic in the case of constipation. It has a soothing effect on the stomach and bowels. This treatment, continued for a few months together with proper attention to diet, will alleviate mild cases of dyspepsia.

MARLBANK.

Dr. Wagar, Dentist, Napanee, will be at the Stinson House, Marlbank, on Friday, Nov. 9th.

A NATIONAL APPLE DAY.

Two years ago a national apple day was instituted in the United States, to be observed annually on the 3rd Tuesday in October. The approaching date will be celebrated with special enthusiasm.

There is urged many all things, that there should be a general dist. of apples all over the country on that occasion and if such a measure should be faithfully carried out, it will mean that the consumption of fruit would be a fruit millionaires were to up-to-date methods of fruit growing. Fruit-growing children were given profitable employment during the autumn harvest and enjoy the autumn foliage. Then all school children were given apples, and special exercises on the planting and care of trees were held in educational institutions. In many of the larger cities, hospitals, orphan homes and all asylums depending for their life, partially on voluntary gifts, were most generously remembered with supplies of apples for the winter season.

The repetition of such a programme would not come as neither in the second day other year. Days gone on, and new educational features will be made from each, and orchardists and fruit growers will be remedy the evil when the apple crop is a failure, and how to overcome the ravages of a full crop are most abundant.

BE A STRONG MAN.

Increase your wizzilty and nerve energy, restore sex and force to your system by using Ferrozone. Ferrozone is the act it did for Walter Wood, of Bensonville, Ill., who says: "I can say Ferrozone has given me a new lease on life. A year ago I myself was so from nervous exhaustion was unable to attend to my affairs around my Appetite was gone, I had no color in my face, and suffered from pain. A few boxes of Ferrozone started me back to health and strength. Every part of my health was completely restored. I am now well, strong, nervous, and can thoroughly recommend Ferrozone, 50c per box at all druggists.

Dr. Hugo's Health Tablets Are just for women and Contain just what every Sick and Run-down Woman Needs.

Do you know that distinguished physicians say that ninety per cent. of the ills of women result from your peculiar organism?

This should make clear to you the need and advantage of taking a remedy that contains sterile and female tonics.

You know, of course, that remedies made to sell to men as well as women do not contain these. They cannot.

Dr. Hugo's Health Tablets for Women (not for men) contain them all, and you don't have to take our word for this. Chemists and physicians, whose standings makes their statements reliable, say that not one single medical ingredient of any value to women has been omitted from them.

What is the result? Simply this.

When you buy a box of these tablets you get a remedy compounded just for your special needs, and one containing all that medical science can supply in this twentieth century to make you a healthy woman. What more could you ask?

And unless your experience should be different than that of other women, you need nothing more. If you don't feel as well as you would like to, try these tablets.

They Make Healthy Women.

A NOTABLE EVENT.

For some time past the Oddfellows of this town have been working hard to secure a strong high-class attraction for the winter, and something new and novel in the way of an entertainment, to be given under the auspices of the near future. With this in view they finally closed negotiations whereby they are to secure Mr. Newcry Beers, the well known dramatic impersonator, in the highly interesting character sustation of the dramatic persona in the popular dramatic divertisement entitled "David and Jonathan." This event is booked by Argyle Judge No. 212, I.O.O.F., at the Hickson Opera House, on Wednesday, November 21st, and ample preparations are being used to make the affair a notable event. Mr. Beers has been so long before the public in Shakespearean and other roles that he needs but little introduction to the appreciative loving public of this town. Direct from Boston engagements to his appearance in Napanee, Mr. Beers deserves, and no doubt will be greeted by a large audience. Recitals at 8 p.m.

FALL WORK AGAINST INSECTS.

Prof. C. J. S. Bethune.

The time of year has now arrived when the insect enemies of fruit have received their active work and are withdrawn from observation and consequently most people assume in the conclusion that the season's fight is over and that nothing more is to be done before. But this is very far from being the case, and the most destructive insects that can be more easily dealt with at the present time of the year.

First and foremost the Pea-weevil. The losses from this insect have been very much lessened during the last two seasons by its attacks, but this does not mean that we have got rid of the insect, on the contrary the insect is but being in greatly reduced numbers by the more easy life with which it has there is the least suspicion of, the presence of the fruit within. The newly harvested peas, they, and in any case these peas intended for seed, should at once treated with bisulphide of carbon which will kill every insect that is exposed to its fumes. The method is not dear enough; put the peas in a large tight cask or box, and place in an open pan on top of the peas a quantity of the bisulphide to every 100 lbs. of peas. Bisulphide is very volatile, and will pour up tightly and leave for 48 hours then open up and expose the peas to the air. There is a thorough draft of air; do not allow any fire or flame near the vapour is very inflammable and explosive; every other insect pest except the pea-weevil and end non-infested seed will be suitable for next year. The same treatment should be used for the seed-weevil, which is a serious pest in one parts of the province.

In addition to the treatment of the peas themselves, the pea-straw and chaff which should be stored for winter and all refuse where threshing has been done should be a similarly got rid of. This will destroy any weevils that have straggled and cut are attempting to stay for the winter. It will be well to watch the insect to see if it is known to be present or not.

Then there are the two impervious pests, namely, clean farming and farming. Both of these are of great importance in either quarters in refuse. Many that infest grain take refuge in the fruit trees, there shelters by roost rubbish, others again hide in tufts of Sheep or Cough Grass as also for the former, under bark, wherever in fact there is no sign of it. The best cure is the time to turn them out and expose them to the frost and the birds. Clean up and burn weeds of every kind, this will destroy many of the insect pests. Leave no heaps of rubbish anywhere. Gather up and burn all immature pile the leaves and stalks of root, potato and other crops. Clean pastures that are infested with white grubs of the June beetle. Scrape the rough bark off the trunks and limbs of fruit trees, but this may be done later on in the winter. By keeping the trees in a healthy and vigorous garden clean, myriads of insects will be prevented from ever getting to the trees or the shelter they need during the winter and will either perish or go elsewhere for a hiding place and thousands more that are in the larger or Cough Grass as also for the destroyed. Many, no doubt, will think all it's too much trouble to do this faithfully try it, they will soon find that it pays.

The new Pure Food and Drug Law will mark it on the label of every Cough Cure containing Chloroform, Opium or other stupifying or poisonous drug. But it passed for 20 years, entirely free. Dr. Shoop's Cough Cure is plainly labeled, the only one the youngest babe—and it cures. It relieves the most stubborn cough, a safe and reliable Cough Cure, by simply inducing nature to do her own work. There is no prevention. Be cheerful fully recommended and well it. T. H. Wallace. 44e

"God Fairy of the Home"

ANCIENT HEROES AND A MODERN DISCOVERY.

Ancient Greece will always be remembered for the fine types of manhood supplied by the heroes of her battlefields and the athletes of her games. Still more till these heroes and athletes themselves be remembered for the custom they bequeathed to later ages of having their victorious places on the bodies by the external application of some secret balm or salve. The Greek characters did not emerge from the mad races with our some severe bruise or gaping wound, and to all such injury carefully with their favorite balm was an indispensable part of the day's programme. If we go back in history—even to Job's time—we find that the external "rubbing" has prevailed among the line, and the only explanation of its universality amidst so many changes in science, seems to lie in the fact that the external use of oils and balms is dictated to us by Nature herself. Our own instinct tell us to rub a part that hurts; and in Zam-Buk the ideal substance to apply to an injured or diseased surface is universally believed to have been found at last.

Most of the ointments, embrocations and salves that have had to suffice in the past are of a coarse consistency, and contain quantities of mineral poison, rancid animal fats, and turpentine. What healing properties they may possess are generally counteracted by the grave danger of inflaming and contaminating the flesh.

Zam-Buk is absolutely free from any such danger. It is entirely herbal, compounded purely from herbal juices, essences and extracts—a rich, foodlike, healing balm. It contains no mineral poison. Just as food rebuilds and restores the body, so Zam-Buk feeds and gives naturally just that assistance which Nature is asking for when pain, swellings, eruptions, or inflammation tell of her distress. Zam-Buk allays all irritation, expels disease, stops suppuration, stops festering and "proud flesh" the skin, toning it up in Nature's own way.

Zam-Buk should be in every home, for it cures all forms of sores, ulcers, piles, ringworm, sores, eczema, ulcers, pimples, boils, rash, raw, rough hands, scalp troubles, bad legs, bad breast, sore throat and chest, sore and aching feet, chilblains, cold sores, festering sores, poisoned wounds, and other distressing skin troubles. In all such conditions of the skin. Rubbed well into the parts affected, Zam-Buk gives great relief from neuralgia, toothache, sciatica, rheumatism, backache, and chest and back pains.

50 cent. boxes, all druggists and stores, or post free from the Zam-Buk Co., Toronto, on receipt of price.

Miss Ettel Kitchum, after spending a few weeks at Mr. E. Peck's has returned home.

The corn husking at Lasher Cronk's on Thursday evening was well attended, but they didn't succeed in getting it all husked.

Mr. and Mrs. Hunter intended to visit Mrs. Sylvester Cronk, died at her home with her son, Mr. S. Cronk, Wagarville, on Sunday, Oct. 14th, at the ripe age of 76 years. For several weeks she was confined to her room with a complication of diseases. For forty years she lived a Christian life and died very happy. The physician in attendance was caused by heart failure. She spent a lot of her time visiting the sick of the neighborhood. Her maiden name was Mina Vanesa. Her husband died about 20 years ago, hardly five months ago. The funeral service was held in the Methodist church, and was conducted by Rev. McIntosh, the pastor. Deceased had been ill for three days before her death. She leaves three sons, Lasher, Solomon and Simeon Cronk, to mourn the loss of a loving mother, but with the knowledge that her great rest was granted, which was to depart and be with Christ. The remains were buried in the cemetery on Orth.

Another sudden death took place at Parham last week. Mr. Mitchell, son of David Goodfellow, well known here, was found dead in his bed.

ENTERPRISE.

A large crowd gathered at the station here on Monday evening, to bid farewell to Mr. and Mrs. Fred Shier and Miss Myrtle, who left for their new home in Toronto. Mr. and Mrs. Shier and daughter will be greatly missed in this village, being highly esteemed by all. We will miss her smiling face from our midst, and all join in wishing her every happiness in her new home. Miss Myrtle was the recipient of many handsome presents as a token of esteem, which we hope will ever remind her of the many happy years spent in this village, and we hope that some time in the near future we shall see her smiling countenance in our midst once more.

For the Stomach Heart and Kidneys

Dr. Shoop's Restorative is a Cause Cure—not a Symptom Cure.

It is a common mistake to take artificial digestives to cure a troublesome heart stimulants for so-called kidney remedies for backache. These organs do not sympathize with each other—they have no connection—and no cure is ever effected by the failure of the organ. It is the nerves which control the organs which control the nerves that can stomach, heart and kidneys be cured. Dr. Shoop, of Racine, Wisconsin, learned by experience that the nerves have the power to make which they obtain their nourishment. Weak nerves cannot obtain this nourishment. Starved nerves become irritable, and irritable nerves are back-ache, heart-ache, stomach-ache, kidney-ache and nerve-ache. Dr. Shoop's Restorative is a nerve tonic. It feeds the starved nerves, makes them strong and vigorous, and when nerve weakness disappears, when nerve sickness disappears, then the stomach, heart and kidneys are restored to health. Dr. Shoop's Restorative is known as Dr. Shoop's Restorative. However the pain and distress of stomach, heart troubles quicker even than no-kidney-designed simply to give relief. Dr. Shoop's Restorative can relief—imagine ever where. For sale and recommended by

The Bridal Eve

Laura Elmer went down to the front hall in which she found Sir Vincent with a lady, clothed in black and closely veiled, leaning upon his arm.

When Laura came quite near, he went through a slight presentation, merely saying, in a very low tone:

"Mrs. Ravenscroft, Miss Elmer."

Laura courtesied, and was about to offer her hand, when the lady, without raising her veil, grasped it, and immediately averted her head.

Sir Vincent then led her out, and placed her in a carriage. He then returned to Laura, handed her into a seat beside Mrs. Ravenscroft, and told the coachman to drive to the park. As the baronet disappeared within, and as Laura was settling herself in the carriage, she observed a gentleman on horseback emerge from around the corner, and then, as though unwilling to be discovered, retreat behind the angle of the house.

She had twice before noticed this individual loitering near the entrance of Lester House. And now his appearance the third time, and seemingly with the same purpose of espionage, filled her mind with vague surmises, which were, however, unmixed with misgivings, for certainly there was nothing whatever sinister in the appearance of this man.

He seemed to be about twenty-eight or thirty years of age, with a tall and elegant figure, a fine head, covered with shining, light yellow hair, that fell in clustering curls around a forehead white, smooth, and round as that of childhood; his features were delicate and regular, his eyebrows softly traced, his eyes blue, clear, and gentle in their gaze, his nose straight lips and chin moulded into the very ideal of sweetness and benevolence. Frankness, affection, and gay good-humor were blended in the habitual expression of this captivating countenance.

So Laura Elmer felt no misgiving at seeing this gentleman, for the third time, loitering near Lester House. His motives and purposes might be eccentric, but could not, with such a face as that, be evil.

The carriage drove on, and in due time turned into the park. It was, as usual, thronged with visitors in carriages, on horseback, or on foot.

The lady by Laura's side had not once raised her veil or spoken a word; and Laura herself was too much absorbed in thought to break her companion's reverie until they had reached the park, when, thinking it well to engage the unhappy lady in conversation, she said:

"There is quite a numerous assemblage of visitors here to-day. Will you not throw aside your veil, and look out?"

"No, no; but you may let down the windows, please; the air is stifling," replied the lady, in a low voice.

Laura opened the windows, and the carriage wound slowly around one of the most beautiful and secluded avenues of the park. They had left the gay throng of fashionable visitors behind, and had reached a quarter frequented by nursemaids and young children.

"See," said Laura, "we have reached a very quiet part now; will you not raise your veil, and breathe some of this delicious air?"

The lady put aside her veil, revealing again that face of ghastly pallor, with its bloodless lips, wild black eyes, and shadowy black tresses.

"See! observe these various groups of little children as they pass; how much marked individuality there is even in these little people; their very looks and manners tell their characters and histories. These, now, are the children of some wealthy citizen, with their pampered nurse—observe the children, all flounces and sashes, hats and feathers—could see the consequential air of their over-dressed attendant," said Laura, wishing to win her companion from her sorrowful thoughts.

The pale woman looked languidly forth, but neither the pomposity of the nurse nor the vanity of the babies could bring one smile to those sad lips.

"Yet, look again," said Laura. "There is quite a different group; there is some poor young widow who has left her occupation to bring her little boy and girl out for an airing."

Mrs. Ravenscroft looked out, and seemed more interested in this little group. After eyes became riveted to the two children, and, like the flame of an expiring candle, burned out for one moment, flickering in and out from her usually deathlike face. At last her fixed regard attracted the attention of the boy, who exclaimed, as he pulled his mother's sleeve:

"Oh, mother! see that beautiful, pale lady! how she looks at us!"

The young widow turned to look, when her attention was immediately recalled by the little girl, who, starting forward and pointing eagerly, exclaimed:

"Mother, mother! Here! Here is the man that took away my sister Grace!"

The excitement and vehemence of the child drew all eyes to follow the direction of her outstretched finger.

The widow started, and turned deadly pale.

Laura Elmer followed the index of the child, and to her surprise, saw the same man who had watched them from the corner of Lester House. He was still on horseback, and had evidently followed their carriage to the park. He had now reined up his horse in a line with the side windows of the carriage, but at a few yards distance, where he contained calmly upon the watch.

Before Laura could form a conjecture upon the circumstance, she was startled by a shriek from her companion.

She turned quickly round, but Mrs. Ravenscroft had already darted to the open window, from which she beheld, with her wild eyes dilated, her white arms and clasped hands extended toward the horseman, and her piercing voice, calling in an agony of supplication:

"Rayburne! Rayburne! Rayburne! Rayburne!"

The thrilling anguish of those tones could never be described, and never be forgotten.

Two Good Things to Take

A holiday and FERROL, both if possible, but if you cannot take a holiday you can at least take FERROL and that is by far the more important.

If you are overworked, fagged and generally run down a holiday will, no doubt, afford temporary relief. In like case will effect a permanent cure and restore normal conditions. A holiday is good, FERROL is better; the two taken together are simply irresistible. FERROL, being a scientifically prepared combination of Oil with Iron and Phosphorus, supplies everything that is needed to restore lost weight, renew flagging vim and energy and build up the system generally. Everyone can take FERROL in summer as well as in winter and it never disappoints.

FERROL is not a patent mystery. The formula is freely published. It is prescribed by the leading Physicians. It is endorsed by the most eminent Medical Journals. It is used in prominent Hospitals, Sanitariums, etc.

The horseman smiled and held out his arms.

A wild cry of joy burst from the lips of Helen, as she tried to break open the carriage door. But Laura threw her arms around the form of the excited woman, and forced her back into her seat, where her resistance suddenly ceased, and she sank in a swoon.

Laura was greatly shocked. She stopped the carriage, and began to bathe the hands and face of the fainting woman with some Hungary water that she happened to have at hand. While thus anxiously engaged in trying to restore consciousness to her charge, she heard her own name softly called, and looking up she saw Ferdinand Cassinove and young Percy Lester standing beside the carriage window.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Elmer, but my young friend Percy here recognized your carriage, and hastened on coming to walk through the park. Your companion seems to be ill. Can I be of any service?" said the tutor.

"Oh, Mr. Cassinove, I am so glad that you are here! Yet I do not know how you can assist me, either," said Laura, suddenly recollecting Sir Vincent's orders that Mrs. Ravenscroft was to be seen by no one; yet greatly perplexed to know how she should get home with her strange charge, should the latter, unmanageable.

"The lady has fainted! Let me assist you," eagerly pleaded Cassinove, attempting to open the carriage door.

"No, no; she is recovering now, and you must leave us if you please, Mr. Cassinove; but first tell me how you came on the strange scene have you witnessed?"

"The whole of it. Percy and myself were walking in the park, as I said. He recognized your carriage, and we were coming toward it, when I happened to see my landlady with her two children: I saw the little girl start forward with an exclamation that drew every one's attention, mine among the rest, toward a certain horseman, a light-haired gentleman, in whom those children had painful cause to be interested, and I saw the frantic gestures and heard the wild cries of your friend before she fainted. And now, as you will not permit me to assist you in any way, I shall go in search of that mysterious, light-haired Adonis, with whom also I have an account to settle on behalf of the widow and her orphans. So I shall see before night, whether, despite his very prepossessing appearance, and fascinating manner, I cannot bring him to the intimate acquaintance of the magistrate," said young Cassinove, bowing and retiring. And lifting his hat, he bowed deeply, and walked rapidly away.

Laura Elmer then gave her exclusive attention to her patient, who had now recovered sufficiently to enable her to sit up and breathe freely.

Helen Ravenscroft looked around with a bewildered gaze, and seemed to return to her, sigh after sigh burst from her bosom.

Laura gave orders to the coachman to drive home.

"I hope you feel better," she said, in a gentle voice, turning to her strange companion.

"Better, better! yes, I should be better in my grave! Oh, that dreamless sleep! Ah, why does death seize the loved and the happy from all the blessings of life, and leave the desolate and wrecked to all its curses!" cried Helen, in the same piercing tones of anguish with which she had spoken to the stranger.

"Can I serve you in no way, Mrs. Ravenscroft?" pleaded Laura.

"In no way but one; conceal from Sir Vincent the circumstance of my meeting—"

She was unable to pronounce the name; her voice that had been faltering, now utterly sank, and she broke into a passion of tears and sobs.

Laura drew the poor head down upon her own bosom, and with tender words and caresses sought to soothe this inexplicable sorrow.

"Dear Mrs. Ravenscroft," she said, looking calmly into the wild and troubled eyes of her companion, and modulating her voice to the sweetest tenderness, "whatever the unknown cause of your sorrow may be, believe me, I sympathize with you from my soul. I will serve you to the extent of my power; and I will never reveal the incident of this afternoon, unless I should be convinced that your own safety and welfare required it."

Helen Ravenscroft caught and kissed the hand that was extended to her in pledge of the speaker's sincerity, and then she drew her black veil across her face, and relapsed into silence, which lasted until they reached Lester House.

Sir Vincent Lester met them in the hall, thanked Miss Elmer for her kindness, and took the hand of Mrs. Ravenscroft, and hoping that she had enjoyed the drive, he led her away.

That same evening, after tea, Laura Elmer was alone in the sitting-room used in common by the governess and her pupils, when there came a knock at the door, and to her gentle "Come in," entered Ferdinand Cassinove.

"I pray you will forgive this intrusion, and grant me a few moments conversation, Miss Elmer," he said.

"Certainly, Mr. Cassinove," replied Laura, inviting him to be seated.

He took the offered chair, and said.

"I wish to speak to you, Miss Elmer, in regard to the appearance of that strange man, who caused so much consternation to your friend, as well as to your mercenary landlady and her children. Forgive the question; but do you know anything of him?"

"Nothing whatever, Mr. Cassinove, except that I have three times seen him lingering about the vicinity of Lester House, and that to-day he certainly followed our carriage from this house to the park."

"Did he attempt to speak to any one in your carriage?"

"No, not once. He kept out of our sight even until the moment that every one's attention was called to him by the exclamation of the little girl."

"Little Emily Russel?"

"Yes."

"It is most singular. You do not even know his name?"

"No."

"Nor suspect who he may be?"

"No."

"It is perfectly unaccountable. The unhappy lady in your carriage, who swooned at the sight of this strange man, called him Rayburne, I think."

"Yes," replied Laura, hearing again in imagination those piercing cries of anguish—"Rayburne! Rayburne! Rayburne!"

"And—gray forgive my inquisitiveness, I have an excellent reason for it, which I will soon explain—the lady gave you no explanation of her own painful interest in this man?"

"None whatever. I know no more than yourself."

"Possibly not so much, Miss Elmer. And now I will give you my reasons for taking so deep an interest in the discovery of this man. The little woman in black, with the two children, who keep landlady, a widow, who kept a little trimming shop in Berkeley street. A few days ago, during my absence, and while the shop was left in charge of the two children, this very man, whom they recognized, came in a cab in broad daylight, and removed the most valuable part of the widow's little stock, telling the simple children that he had already purchased it for the orphan asylum. The most singular feature in the case is, that the poor widow, even in her great trouble, refuses to seek legal redress, without assigning any reason for her strange forbearance. She would even have made me promise not to endeavor to find him out, but I informed her that it was the duty of every honest man of the community to prevent the commission of fraud, even at the guilty. Your young friend who was so dreadfully agitated by the appearance of this man, and uttered some cry to his identity if she would. Can you not serve the cause of justice by inducing her to do so?"

"Alas, no! for she not only refused to give me any explanation of the cause of her agitation, but she even swung from me a conditional promise not to inform Sir Vincent of her accidental encounter with this man."

From this day, for several weeks, no more was seen or heard of the mysterious "light-haired stranger," whose appearance had caused so much disturbance.

CHAPTER XIV.

Light came back to the dark eyes, and color to the pale cheeks of Laura Elmer. Some weeks of lively exercise and inspiration seemed opened in her soul. There were few in that large household that cared to observe the looks of the governess, else they must have seen the change that was coming over her countenance; the new bright beauty that at once softened and irradiated her noble features. It was sweeter, more tender to her rich, deep voice, and a more elastic grace to all her stately motions. She seemed, indeed, as one who had found, at last,

The End of Books.

What brings about the end of books? Is it fire, water, worms? As every ship launched is bound to be wrecked, every theater to be burned, the fate of the book is its reduction to ashes. What became of the Alexandrian library? Did the Saracens burn it in 640? There is this question asked: Were there any libraries in Alexandria containing 700,000 books? Gibbon inclines to the opinion that there was no such library. Canon Taylor insists that there had been a library that was burned in the time of Julius Caesar. Tradition seems to indicate, however, that there was a library in the serapeum. By no means is any collection, whether destroyed by Theophilus or Theodosius is not known. It looks as if the charge recently against the Arabs, that all persons having any claims against the estate of the said Samuel Wagar, deceased, who died on or about the sixth day of November, A.D. 1905, are required on or before the 6th day of November, A.D. 1906, to send by post prepaid or to deliver to the undersigned Solicitors for Harriet Ann Carscallen, Administrator of the estate of the said Lemuel Oscar Wagar, deceased, their names, addresses and descriptions and full particulars of their claim or claims and the nature of the security, if any, held by them duly verified.

And notice is hereby further given that after the said 6th day of November, A.D. 1906, the said Administrator will proceed to distribute the assets of the said estate among the persons entitled thereto, having regard only to those claims of which she shall then have had notice, and that the Administrator will not be liable for the said assets or any part thereof to any person or persons for whose claim she shall not then have had notice.

MEETING OF THE LADIES.

The ladies of the town with commendable zeal, have called a meeting of all those interested in Hospital work for Thursday afternoon next, 8th Nov., at the hour of three o'clock. At this meeting Mrs. Dr. Ormond, President of the Hospital is to give a report, and explain the scope of work done by the Kingston Hospital. Mrs. Connell wishes it understood that she is not coming to solicit subscriptions This we can do which every lady can help in this good work are very numerous. To know that each year many go from our midst to receive treatment and care in this institution is to feel the afflicted and hope for the success of the treatment. As all the ladies spoken to have expressed themselves in favor of doing something, it is fully expected that there will be a splendid meeting in the Public Library on Thursday afternoon next.

MASONRY AT BATH.

Monday was a red letter day in the history of the Masonic fraternity here, the occasion being the annual visit of the D.D.G.M. Rt. Worshipful Bro. Wm. Jackson, of Kingston. A large number of visiting brethren were present from Kingston, Napanee, Odessa, Newburgh and Centreville, and all expressed themselves as having had a most enjoyable time. The work of the officers was highly commended by the D.D.G.M., and by all who were present, and the banquet which followed was undoubtedly the best known in the history of the craft in this place. Mrs. Graham, of the Bay View Villa, who was the caterer of the evening, certainly outdid herself in her efforts, and many were the congratulations showered upon her, not only by the members of Mizpah Lodge, but by those from a distance. The company broke up about 1 a.m., and all expressing themselves as delighted with the reception which they had received.

Growth is life. While a tree grows it is all right; when it stops it goes to decay. So does a business—and the healthy business not only grows some once in a while, but grows each year, so that it adds almost regular layers of growth, just as the good tree does.

We steer this business craft by the range lights of comparison—making each year excel the preceding year, making each October excel the October previous.

The business of this last October exceeds the business of October, 1905, by a very large amount.

The live growing store serves you best; just as the limb of the live, healthy tree is the safest to sit upon.

"THE JOURNEY OF LIFE"

TRUST IN MATERIAL POSSESSIONS NOT BEST EQUIPMENT.

THE CALL TO WORLD SERVICE

Work For the Lord Is Insistent, Inasmuch as One May Not Boast of Having Other Time Than the Present to Do It In—None Know What a Day or an Hour May Bring Forth.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1905, by Frederick Haner, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 23.—In this sermon the preacher shows the folly of trusting in a continuance of material blessings as a means of happiness. The text is Luke xii., 19: "Soul, thou hast thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

One of the most impressive pictures I have ever seen was one entitled "The Journey of Life. It depicted a row-boat being pulled out to a ship in the offing. A large family—with their household goods were in the boat. In the stern were the gray-haired grandfather and grandmother. Like the great picture of Napoleon leaving France, these two old folks were earnestly scanning the receding shore. Their lives were nearly ended, and their thoughts were in the past. They were living in memory in the sweet memories of the days that were gone. At the feet of the old folks their grandchildren were playing with their toys. Like two little kittens, they did not seem to care what was to happen next. Their thought world had not yet been entered. Just beyond two young lovers were plighting their troth. They were walking for a little while in the cloudlands. They were sipping for a short time the sweet nectar of the flowers which bloom only for a day during the mating of the birds. But at the prow of the boat stood the strong man of the world, with his wife by his side. His eye had an eagle glance. His head rested on his hand. He seemed to be looking into the dim future, at his home which was yet to be built in a foreign land, at the visionary fields which were yet to be tilled and at the fortune which was yet to make. The picture was suggestive to my mind of that momentous journey which we call the voyage of life.

Not all of us reach the stage typified by the grandparents. Some come to the end of the journey in the period of childhood, some in youth, some in mature life. It is very uncertain, but it is well in our early years to plan carefully for the future instead of spending the time in idle dreaming or in pleasure. The foundations of our career are laid earlier than some of us imagine, and, whether little or much long or short, those foundations should be laid well.

These plans are very different from the presumptuous boasting condemned in my text. Here King Solomon describes the way men, the reddest and the procrastinating man, the man who is giving free license to his evil passions, the man who is deaf and blind to all the magnificent opportunities of the glorious present as he says to himself: "I shall be attended to, and ought to do. But what is the difference? Rome was not built in a day. Life is not ended and put on the bridge of twenty-four hours. This day I will eat and drink and be merry, and to-morrow I will begin to do what I do." "Ah," says the great king, "to-day is thine. This coming twilight may be thy last eventide. Perhaps the moon which will arise to-night will shine through the open window and touch thine ashen cheek as the attendants are preparing thy body for the burial. To-morrow's sun never can be a neighbor, but this day may usher in for thee an endless and unchanging eternity." Let me read for you again the sentence, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

These words are a timely warning to those who are slowly, yet surely, allowing the things of an evil hour to entwine about them—timely because these poor deluded victims seem to be going to their destruction with veiled open eyes, as an ox to the slaughter. But somehow they feel that no matter how deep their sins may be, by coming to the quicksands or how thick the slimy seaweeds may be wrapping themselves about the mariner's body, yet they can come safe to land and break loose from their evil habits whenever they will. Now, my friend, I would tell you that an evil habit instead of growing weaker with passing years grows stronger. It is folly for a man to say, "I will break away from this evil habit to-morrow." If you cannot break away from that evil habit to-day you cannot to-morrow. If you are not willing to break away from an evil habit to-day, in all probability you will be weaker still to-morrow. The law of the increasing moral weakness of the wrongdoer is as inexorable as the strength of an evil habit is irrevocable.

A man becomes more and more helpless. He would merely fall back, just as in the clutch of the quicksand. I am glad I used that illustration. It is one that you will find if you have ever been caught in those treacherous depths. I remember some time ago when driving through the western country we came to a rather wide creek. It was about to drive through it when the gentleman with whom I was riding said, "Wait; let me test it." He took off his shoes and stockings and started for the other side. "Come on!" he cried. "It is shallow all through." I shook the reins as a signal to the horse, and he started. He went only a few steps and then stopped, frightened. He made a leap to stop than the wheels of the wagon began to sink. "Come on! Come on!" cried my companion. "The quicksands are catching you. Come on!" But come on I could not. In a minute or two the wagon had sunk a third of the way to the hubs. The horse could not pull the load. It was no time for argument. We leaped out of the wagon and plunged into the water, clothes and all. Then every hand took hold of the wagon and we pulled it out. We were soaking, and we just saved the wagon and the horse. "Ah," I said to myself as I was driving along on the other side, how like the deceptive influence of the quicksands are evil habits! When we first drive up to them they seem so harmless and innocent, but no sooner do we allow these evil habits to grasp us than, like the dangerous quicksands, they will creep up to the ankle, then to the knee, then to the hip and then to the heart. Then the more we struggle the deeper we will sink and the more helpless we will become."

My friend, what right have you to say that the evil habit which is working such damage in your life is one you will be more easy to eradicate to-morrow? If it is difficult to chain a little cur, he is nearly a full hand and bits and scratches and tears your bleeding flesh to get away, will it be easier to tame and cage the Bengal tiger after he has gained his strength and has learned to sharpen his claws, replaces and his jaws have the vigor of a steel trap? If the Alpine climber is so benumbed with cold that he soon becomes heavy with sleep, will that cold cease to continue its deadly work when he lies down to slumber and the whistling winds cover his shivering flesh with a soft quilt of snow? I see now three travelers lost upon the western prairie. A biting blizzard is carrying them to their doom. They are knife. One of these travelers, physically weaker than his companions, becomes exhausted. Drowsily he lies on the ground and goes to sleep. His two friends jerk him up and begin to pound him and to rub him. They throw upon the frozen flesh. "Oh," he says, "let me sleep! Let me sleep just a little while, and then I will go with you." "No," they say; "you must not sleep. If you do it will be the sleep of death. Every minute is cold with benumbing you more and more. You must walk. You must throw off this lethargy or you will die." Thus these two friends drag him round and round all night long, preventing him from falling to their doom. In this benumbing way our evil habits affect us. We say: "To-morrow we will make changes. Just no more glass, one more carousal. But each intoxicating cup, each debauch, each yielding to the passions more and more helpless to fight sin. My brother, if you do not conquer your evil habits to-day you will be powerless them to-morrow. If you cannot put out a spark to-day you cannot quench a great conflagration. If you will be not stop on the smouldering fuse you cannot put out the explosion that comes when the explosive has reached it. Now is the time for you to get your emancipation from that destroying and deadly evil habit — now, now, now! Oh, the importance of that infinite word now! But the world stood too much on reading rebuke to the visionary seeker after happiness as well as to those who slowingly mutter to their evil habits, "Oh, let me rest upon my bed of sin a little while longer, and then I shall bestir myself and do as I ought to do." Let me read for you again the sentence, "Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

These words are a timely warning to those who are slowly, yet surely, allowing the things of an evil hour to entwine about them—timely because these poor deluded victims seem to be going to their destruction with veiled open eyes, as an ox to the slaughter. But somehow they feel that no matter how deep their sins may be, by coming to the quicksands or how thick the slimy seaweeds may be wrapping themselves about the mariner's body, yet they can come safe to land and break loose from their evil habits whenever they will. Now, my friend, I would tell you that an evil habit instead of growing weaker with passing years grows stronger. It is folly for a man to say, "I will break away from this evil habit to-morrow." If you cannot break away from that evil habit to-day you cannot to-morrow. If you are not willing to break away from an evil habit to-day, in all probability you will be weaker still to-morrow. The law of the increasing moral weakness of the wrongdoer is as inexorable as the strength of an evil habit is irrevocable.

A man becomes more and more helpless. He would merely fall back, just as in the clutch of the quicksand. I am glad I used that illustration. It is one that you will find if you have ever been caught in those treacherous depths. I remember some time ago when driving through the western country we came to a rather wide creek. It was about to drive through it when the gentleman with whom I was riding said, "Wait; let me test it." He took off his shoes and stockings and started for the other side. "Come on!" he cried. "It is shallow all through." I shook the reins as a signal to the horse, and he started. He went only a few steps and then stopped, frightened. He made a leap to stop than the wheels of the wagon began to sink. "Come on! Come on!" cried my companion. "The quicksands are catching you. Come on!" But come on I could not. In a minute or two the wagon had sunk a third of the way to the hubs. The horse could not pull the load. It was no time for argument. We leaped out of the wagon and plunged into the water, clothes and all. Then every hand took hold of the wagon and we pulled it out. We were soaking, and we just saved the wagon and the horse. "Ah," I said to myself as I was driving along on the other side, how like the deceptive influence of the quicksands are evil habits! When we first drive up to them they seem so harmless and innocent, but no sooner do we allow these evil habits to grasp us than, like the dangerous quicksands, they will creep up to the ankle, then to the knee, then to the hip and then to the heart. Then the more we struggle the deeper we will sink and the

She did not care to tell.

She seemed to have discovered, within the depths of her own spirit, the secret of an infinite content. For all the ends of earthly happiness she appeared to be sufficient unto herself, as one whose treasures were all within, safe from external vicissitudes, independent of exterior circumstances.

Indeed, there was little in her outer life to strengthen, or account for, her. She saw no company, went to no places of amusement; had no congenial friends. Her mornings were passed in the schoolroom and music-room with her young pupils; her afternoons in driving out with Mrs. Ravenscroft, who had lapsed into silent reserve; and her evenings in the solitude of her own room, where she occupied her time in reading and writing.

Only at meal times, and in the presence of her pupils, she met Mr. Cassinove and his young charge, Master Lester.

She had not seen Lady Lester once since the interview in her ladyship's drawing-room.

Sir Vincent Lester frequently visited the schoolroom, and often sent to request the presence of Miss Elmer in the library.

And it might have been observed that the only occasions on which Miss Elmer's clear brow was clouded were those of the baronet's visits to the schoolroom, or his own enforced attendance in the library.

Children frequently see and hear things without understanding anything. They saw their father's solicitous attention to what governess needs and comforts, his readiness to serve her with advice or assistance, his disarming kindness in every word and deed, and they saw the reserve with which Miss Elmer received all absolutely necessary attentions, and the coldness with which she repelled all others.

Julia will get tired of being good so as ungrateful a person as Miss Elmer," declared Miss Lester. "I am sure I don't see why she should treat him so coldly."

And, indeed, if Laura Elmer had been upon oath, and forced to give an answer to the question, why she doubted, feared and disliked Sir Vincent Lester, she would not have given a satisfactory reason. He was a very handsome, polished and graceful gentleman, of a highly-cultivated intellect, highly-polished address, and an unblemished character and reputation. In his manners to Miss Elmer, as to all others, there was nothing to which the most fastidious could take exception. And yet Laura Elmer, usually so thankful for all true kindness, felt that his every attention was ingratitude, but resentment and distrust, which she could neither understand nor explain. She said, in one of the occasions upon which her clear brow was clouded were those of the visits of Sir Vincent, or the summons to her, or of her own required attendance in library.

Laura Elmer kept up her correspondence with her old pastor, Dr. Seymour, and through him heard frequently of Ethel Vane, as her prospects brightened, and her position settled into stability. She graduated with many of my tastes and pursuits, never cared for the well-being of our own children; never, in no word, breathed either me or hers being as incapable to love as she is of thought. Her brain and heart seem to be in two separate compartments, and she had the advantage of an excellent plain education as a foundation upon which to build the superstructure of graceful accomplishments.

It was near the commencement of the fashionable season in London that Laura Elmer received a letter from Rose herself.

"Among the county aristocracy who have run the risk of taking me up before the House of Lords shall have decided the matter," she wrote, "the most important is the Duchess of Beresleigh Court. You know, of course, that my husband occupied a distinguished diplomatic position on the Continent. He died at Berlin about two years ago, but the family remained abroad for the health of their invalid daughter, Lady Katherine, Mathilda and Annie Wardour; they are all excessively kind to me. The duchess has made me promise that after the House of Lords shall have decided upon my case, I will accompany her to London, and remain her guest at Beresleigh House for the whole of the season. She undertakes to become my sponsor in society, and to present me to their Majesties.

"You know I have a taste for novels. Have you seen a new one called 'Woman,' written by an anonymous writer, and reviewed in all the principal journals of the day. I have read the reviews, with many extracts from that beautiful work; and the slight tastes I have only stimulated my mental appetite for a feast of the whole volume. Some paragraphs I have read lead me to conjecture as to the authorship of the poem, and even the sex of the author; some sacrilegiously point to a man and some to a woman. The duke, who has a highly-cultivated taste, and a very discriminating judgment, says his criticisms in these words: 'It is written with masculine power, yet no man could have written it.' Should you ever feel the need this poem, you will forgive me for talking so much about it. If you have not read it get the volume, and you will not blame me."

After perusing this letter, Laura Elmer sat holding it open in her hand, with her smiling eyes fixed upon vacancy.

"It is understood; it has reached one heart and soul at least; one, too, whose thoughts are worthy of record. Julia may flow to benefit a thousand others."

While she sat in this happy, dreamy reverie, there was a gentle knock at the door.

Believing it to come from one of her pupils, she rose from the window-seat, and looking up, beheld, to her surprise, the master of the house.

The baronet had never before intruded into this apartment. With a sudden flush upon her cheek, Laura arose to meet him.

"It is understood; it has reached one heart and soul at least; one, too, whose thoughts are worthy of record. Julia may flow to benefit a thousand others."

While she sat in this happy, dreamy reverie, there was a gentle knock at the door.

Believing it to come from one of her pupils, she rose from the window-seat, and looking up, beheld, to her surprise, the master of the house.

The baronet had never before intruded into this apartment. With a sudden flush upon her cheek, Laura arose to meet him.

The baronet was a man who could do an emergency with the utmost ease and refined manner, paradoxical as it may seem. Bowing, and waving his hand in the most courteous manner, and modulating his voice to the lowest and sweetest key, he said:

"Forgive my intrusion, Miss Elmer, and pray resume your seat."

Laura Elmer bowed coldly in reply to this compliment.

"I hope you will do me the favor of using this easy chair; it is full of my marks, but I trust that it will not be very much less acceptable or interesting on that account," continued the baronet, quite unconscious of the covert vanity betrayed in this sentence.

"Sir Vincent Lester's literary taste is indisputable," replied Laura.

He then placed the volume in her hand, with a most respectable preface, accompanied with a scarcely audible sigh, bowed, and withdrew.

Laura Elmer's happy reverie was over for that evening. A frown corrugated the usual noble calmness of her brow, as standing where he had left her, she conferred with herself:

"What can that mean? Kindness, perhaps, and only simple kindness to a friendless girl. It is ungrateful, and I should be ashamed to think otherwise, and yet I should be happier and more comfortable if Sir Vincent Lester's dollars rest much less in my comfort and happiness. For though reason can find no positive cause for offense, my instinct teaches me to dread these attentions. I will for once disregard my instinct, and be guided by unerring instinct. I will obey no more summonses to the library, and will remain as much as possible in the schoolroom. I will henceforth spend my evenings in my own private apartment."

So saying, Laura Elmer sat down and opened the volume that she had very reluctantly accepted, and only because she had no civil pretext for declining it.

In looking over the poem she was less engrossed than surprised to find that those passages which most deeply interested her own sympathies were never mind, my dear; let us hope it is not true; we have nothing to ground a belief upon but a newspaper paragraph, which is the most mendacious thing in existence. It is generally safe to believe just the opposite of that which it states."

"That may my only hope; and it is just possible that Sir Vincent and the duchess and this young paragon at Carleton House to-night; I have ordered Robert to be in attendance—and here he comes," said her ladyship, as the door opened, and gave admittance to Mr. Ruthven Lester.

"Success to your diplomacy. I would give the duchess a long start, and kick your cool, clear head at the first odds against all her grace's hot haste," said the barrister, as he entered.

"And, by the way, Sir Vincent, if you should go out before I rise in the morning, I will thank you to send me a ticket for a thousand pounds! I must give a party for this young baroness."

"Ah," said the baronet, "the matrimonial lottery cost something, I see," thought Sir Vincent, as he gallantly handed his lady to her chair.

At Carleton House that evening the beauty, fashion and celebrity of the West End were all congregated to assist at one of the most brilliant entertainments that followed the nuptials of the Prince of Wales with the amiable and accomplished Princess Caroline of Brunswick. Never a scene of almost Oriental magnificence, splendor and luxury. Not a seraglio of an Eastern monarch, not the sensuous paradise of a follower of Mohammed, could have presented a larger or more varied collection of houris than were gathered together in the royal drawing-rooms of Carleton House. Above this crowd of brilliant brunettes and delicate blondes, no less than four rival queens of beauty contended the confidant of his pleasures and vices.

"You perceive that the duchess has not appeared in this evening with the beauty," said the prince.

"No, your Royal Highness."

"But then the Duchess of Bereseligh never was a habitue of Carleton House. You have seen this new beauty?"

"Yes, your Royal Highness."

"And are her charms as great as they have been represented?"

"Your Royal Highness may be assured she is a prize worth all the trouble that we shall have to gain her. She is about twenty-four years of age, her form is of medium height and beautifully proportioned, though not yet so rounded as it will be in a few years. Her complexion is as fair as a lily and as blooming as a rose. Her features of a delicate Grecian cast. Her eyes of a dark, brilliant hue. Her cheeks are roses, her lips rosebuds. And her hair, of a bright, warm, golden hue, surrounds this beauteous face like a halo. She is not only a beauty of the first order, but, more than that, a beauty of your Royal Highness' own exquisite taste," said the minion, with a fruciuent bow.

"McMahone, you have succeeded in exciting my interest in this fair creature, and now I shall rely on your skill and address in procuring an interview with her."

"Your Royal Highness knows that I am ever keenly alive to your wishes, and active in your service; and though this Hesperian fruit is guarded by a terrible dragon in the shape of a duchess, I do not at all despair of plucking it for your Royal Highness."

"And remember that a prince's gratitude wafts on your success."

The parties then left the alcove, and mingled with the company.

"Oh, the wretches! the atrocious wretches!" exclaimed Lady Lester, emerging from her concealment, and quite aroused from her usual apathy by the discovery of a plot that threatened not only the ruin of her own plans, but the total destruction of an innocent girl. "The most heinous wretches! And what a fate is this of the friendless young baroness, exposed alike to the matrimonial manoeuvres of an old dowager, and the pursuit of a profligate prince! I must find some way of rescuing her from these perils," concluded her ladyship, highly indignant at the enormity of others, yet in her sweet human self-deception quite unconscious that her own plans in regard to the young baroness were quite as mercenary as those ascribed to the duchess, if not as dishonorable as those discovered in the prince.

The return of Ruthven Lester put an end to her soliloquy. She took the arm of her son and left the palace.

In the hall of Lester House she encountered Sir Vincent, who had just returned from a protracted debate in the House of Commons.

"Well, has your ladyship inveigled—I beg your pardon—fascinated this little rustic beauty?" inquired the baronet.

"I have not even seen her. Trust the duchess for that. I might have known it. The party was not at Carleton House," said her ladyship, pettishly.

"Very proper! Lester House is precisely the last place in the kingdom to which I should introduce a young beauty," replied the baronet.

"Oh, it was not altogether an objection to the society to be found at Carleton House that caused the duchess to absent herself with her charge; it was, I presume, with the intention that few days hence should occur her debut in the drawing-room of their Majesties."

"Quite right," said the baronet, smiling.

"And now, Sir Vincent, I must wish you good-night and retire," said her ladyship, with a cool bend of her fair head, as she turned and ascended one of the stairs to her dressing-room, where she found Mademoiselle Jeanette, the ministering priestess of that temple of vanity, in attendance.

Lady Lester sank indolently into her dressing-chair, lifted her languid eyes to the mirror before her, and started to see the careworn look upon her usually calm face.

"I protest a few more hours of such unpleasant excitement as I have had this evening will give me quite a middle-aged aspect. I really cannot afford, at my age, to make myself anxious on Ruthven's account. He must take his chance with others. And yet it would be a great pity to let the rich old baron of Swinburne slip out of our reach for the want of a little exertion on my part. Well, it is of no use to lose my sleep with thinking. The day is long enough for that, Jeanette!"

"Oui, milady."

"Bring me some of those sedative drops; make my chamber quite dark, and remember in the morning to be in attendance here, to prevent any one making the least noise near my door. I must sleep for three hours, Jeanette."

"Oui, certainement, madame," replied the obsequious femme de chambre, as she assisted her mistress to divest herself of the ball dress and prepare for repose.

CHAPTER XV.

The Duchess of Bereseligh was in very different mood from that with which the jealousy and suspicions of Lady Lester had represented her to be. Her little of "Carleton House" dinner. She was one of nature's as well as of society's noblewomen—one whose personal excellence might have rendered her whole order from the charge of irrational pride and hard selfishness. She educated her daughter and herself in the same high and holy principles that governed her own conduct.

They had lived mostly in Bereseligh Court, which adjoined Swinburne Chase, but the families had never been intimate because the duchess had deeply disapproved the character and conduct of the baron as well as that of the guardian he had left over his heiress; and, in fact, soon after the death of the baron, the Duke of Bereseligh had been appointed by the administer at one of the continental courts, where, at the end of five years, he died.

The duchess and her family spent their first year of mourning in retirement, on the Bereseligh estate, and then returned to Bereseligh Court.

It was but a few years after their settlement at home that Dr. Seymour called upon the duchess, and commended to her kind offices the bereaved Etheridge of Swinburne, and, in answer to the inquiries of her grace, related the strange discovery that had thrown down one young girl from rank and wealth to poverty and dependence, and elevated another from indigence and obscurity to fortune and power. The worthy doctor spoke of both these young persons with the highest praise of their conduct under their opposite ordeals of sudden prosperity and sudden adversity.

The duchess was at once interested in the new claimant for her sympathy at tentions; and no less so in the high-souled woman who had so promptly resigned her fortune and position, and so nobly sustained her cruel reverses.

Her grace promised to call on the new Lady Etheridge, and secretly resolved also, as soon as she should go up to town, to seek out Laura Elmer.

She kept her word, and took an early opportunity of visiting Swinburne Castle. The beauty, goodness and intelligence of the young baroness soon won the love and esteem of the duchess, than whom no woman ever lived better able to judge of the characters of those with whom she was brought into communion.

After the interchanging of several visits between the duchess and Lady Etheridge, her grace invited the young baroness to spend some weeks at Bereseligh Court.

Rose accepted the invitation, and passed a month very pleasantly with her new friends.

It was in the intimacy of daily intercourse that Rosamond learned to revere the lofty character of the duchess, and to love the amiable dispositions of the young Ladies Wardour.

But there was another member of the family that interested Rosamond scarcely less than did the duchess and her daughters; this was, indeed, the present head of the house.

George, Duke of Bereseligh, was now in the thirty-third year of his age. To a very handsome person he united a highly-cultivated mind and an amiable heart.

To his surprise and pleasure he found nothing underlived in the manner and nothing vulgar in the mind of this young beauty and newly-made baroness; indeed, every day discovered new graces in her person and in her spirit; and the duke soon found admiration growing into a warmer and more permanent sentiment.

But at thirty-three men are not so apt to act rashly from an impulse of admiration or affection as they are at ten years younger or ten years older than that age; consequently, the duke held his inclinations in check, and restricted his attentions to Rosamond within such limits of intellectual intercommunion as should be safe to both.

Rosamond on her part began by admiring the son for his resemblance, in person and in character, to the mother whom she so deeply revered; and she found herself taking great pleasure in the society and conversation of the duke when he was present, and in thoughts and memories of him when he was absent; then her mind became more occupied with the future than with the past. The memory of her false and unworthy love was fading from her heart like the black shadows of night. The hope of a higher and holier affection was dawning.

Rosamond seldom or never recurred to the subject of Albert Hastings, alias William, and when she did, it was only to wonder how she could have honored him, first, with such a degree of love, and secondly, with such a degree of hate, when in fact the best and the worst that he deserved was simply pity and contempt.

Still she was surprised and humiliated to find her affections going out to wards another object.

"Is it possible," she said to herself, "that my feelings are so apt to change easily? I will go back to the solitude of Swinburne Castle, and take myself seriously to task until I have come to my senses. In truth, it is quite time, since my thoughts are turning upon one who has never requested me so to employ them."

And back to Swinburne Castle went the young baroness, but not to remain there long.

The Duchess of Bereseligh, with her family, was going to town for the season. She came over to Swinburne Castle, invited Rosamond to be of her party, and would take no denial.

Rosamond, who could refuse the duchess nothing, after a fortnight's absence, yielded. And accordingly it was arranged that Lady Etheridge of Swinburne should accompany the duchess to town, and enter society under the auspices of the Duchess of Bereseligh.

The duke preceded the family by two or three weeks, in order to take his seat in the House of Lords, and give his vote and influence in favor of Rosamond Etheridge, whose claim to the Baronry of Swinburne was then before the peers. There was, however, scarcely a shadow of doubt upon the minds of any as to the final issue of the case.

A few days previous to the commencement of the Duchess of Bereseligh's journey to London, the duke ran down to Somerset, and suddenly appeared at Swinburne Castle, with the news that the great case had been decided in favor of Rosamond Etheridge.

And within a week the whole family, the duchess and her family, accompanied by Lady Etheridge, set out for London, and in due course of time arrive at their town residence, Bereseligh House, Belgrave Square.

CHAPTER XVI.

As soon as it was known that the Duchess of Bereseligh, with the young Ladies Wardour and the youthful Baroness of Swinburne, was in town, a shower of cards fell daily at Bereseligh House. These her grace politely acknowledged by sending or leaving her own card at various residences of the callers.

Many morning visits were also made to the boudoir of the duchess, and these her grace received alone, or with her daughters.

Lady Etheridge was always invited.

Numerous invitations to dinners, evening parties, balls, etc., arrived for the ladies of the family; but all these were politely declined, except such as referred to entertainments to be given after the first drawing-room of the season. In a word, the duchess had determined that her beautiful young guest should make her first entrance into society at the Royal Palace of St. James. With a woman's zest and a mother's zeal she superintended the preparation of a magnificent court dress for Lady Etheridge.

The important day arrived.

Without upon this occasion to give her whole attention to her young protege, the duchess resolved not to embarrass herself with her own daughters. Therefore, she decided that for once the Ladies Wardour should remain at home.

As by her rank the Duchess of Bereseligh took precedence of all ladies, except the duchess and royal descent. It was proper that her grace should be early at the palace. The drawing-room was to be held from twelve to three.

At half-past eleven the duchess, in full dress—a superb costume of rich purple velvet train, an ermine mantle, and headdress formed of a circlet of diamonds and a plume of ostrich feathers—entered the dressing-room of her protegee, to inspect the toilet of the latter.

"Beauty, when unadorned," is not, "adorned the most."

Rose, in her simple cottage dress, had been very pretty.

Rose, in her court dress, was dazzlingly beautiful. Though a young maiden, yet a baroness in her own right she had a maiden's partialities of wearing brilliant jewels. The family diamonds had been vesset for this occasion.

She wore a robe of white point lace over a white satin skirt, and a train of rich white velvet. Her glossy black hair was arranged in ringlets, and covered with a wreath of white rosebuds, glittering with the brilliant dismonds. Bouquets of the same flowers rested upon her bosom, looped up her sleeves, and fastened her train. Circlets of pure diamonds invested her fair neck and arms. Boots of white satin, with diamond buckles; snow-white gloves, a fan of marabout of cobweb texture completed her costume. Excitement had given a more brilliant splendor to deep blue eyes, and a brighter bloom to her cheeks.

The duchess gazed upon her with delight, commended the skill of Mademoiselle Gabrielle, the French dressing-maid, and then turning to her protegee, said:

"The carriage is announced, love, and it is quite time we were off."

They descended to the hall, went out and entered the coach, and in a few minutes were rolling on toward St. James' Palace, where they arrived at twelve o'clock.

The place was thronged with coronetted carriages, filled with splendidly dressed visitors, waiting their turn to draw up before the gates. The coach of the duchess was admitted into its place behind that of the Duchess of Leeds, and in due time drew up before the palace doors.

The duchess and her protegee alighted and entered the palace.

Queen Charlotte had brought from her father's court much of the German love of solemn pomp. The state rooms and ante-rooms of St. James' were filled with officers of the household, in their gorgeous costumes, and with their badges of office.

Leaning upon the arm of the duchess, Lady Etheridge ascended, as many a novice has done before and since, under the overwhelming effect of grandeur and magnificence, a few judicious words from the duchess reassured her, and they passed on to the drawing-room that was already filled with a brilliant company.

At the upper end of the room stood the royal party, consisting of the King and Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Dukes of York and Clarence, and the Princesses Augusta and Amelia. The Duchess of Norfolk was just in the act of paying her respects to royalty. The Duchess of Bereseligh took her place in the circle, and, while waiting her turn, quietly indicated to Lady Etheridge the most noted persons present.

First she named the members of the royal party, upon whom Rose gazed with a hushed veneration.

"That very ordinary-looking old gentleman, my dear, is really the King. That very plain woman by his side is the Queen. That handsome, somewhat dissipated-looking man, on the left of the Queen, is the Prince of Wales. The unhappy-looking woman by his side is the newly-married Caroline of Brunswick, the Princess of Wales. The young ladies on the right of his majesty are the Princesses Augusta and Amelia. The two gentlemen by their sides are the Dukes of York and Clarence," said the duchess, in a voice so low that it was impossible to any one except the interlocutor.

"And those standing in a circle in royal party?" inquired Rose, in a subdued key.

"They are the lords and ladies in waiting upon their majesties—Lord Aylesbury, the Duchess of Ancaster, Lady Holderness, Lady Jersey, and Colonel Hastings."

At the naming of the last two Rose started, and changed color so visibly that the duchess turned and looked at her in silent inquiry.

"Oh," said Rose, in a voice scarcely above her breath, "Colonel Hastings was the guardian of Laura Elmer when she was supposed to be the heiress of Swinburne, and Lady Lester is her present employer and patroness. The sudden sight of persons in such interesting relations with my dearest friend startled me."

"Ah, I see," replied her grace, drawing the arm of her protegee within her own, and moving on toward the royal party.

And while the room seemed whirling around with Rose, the duchess paid her respects to their majesties, and presented "The Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne."

Rose courtesied lowly, and blushed deeply, as she bowed over and kissed the hand that was graciously held out.

Her graceful embarrassment was without the least mauvais honte, and did not detract from her beauty.

A loud murmur of admiration ran through the circle of persons in waiting and her beautiful protegee passed on. As they receded from the royal party, the murmur increased to a sensation which respect for majesty had restrained, grew more audible, and exclamations of:

"How beautiful!"

"How graceful!"

"How elegant!"

"This rising star will eclipse all the court beauties!" were heard all around.

And one baleful whisper reached the ears of the duchess.

"Look, how the eyes of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales follow her. We shall have a new sultan, vice the Countess of Jersey, deposed."

On hearing this wicked whisper, the import of which did not reach the intelligence of Rose's innocent ears, the duchess looked around haughtily, and silenced by a glance the unprincipled speaker, whom she recognized as an officer of the guard in attendance upon the prince's person.

She passed on with her protege through the crowded anterooms to the outer hall, and thence to her carriage.

"You have gained a victory, child, a 'great sensation,' my love. Expect to be invited to the court balls, and everywhere else, as a matter of course. Invitations will pour in upon you. And now that you have, as in duty bound, paid your respects first to royalty, you are at liberty to enter freely into the gayeties of society. Go everywhere you please, accepting always the Duchess House," said the duchess, as they drove homeward.

"Carleton House!" echoed the young baroness, in wonder.

"Yes, dear, Carleton House, the palace of the Prince and Princess of Wales."

"But why not to Carleton House, madam?"

"Because, my dear, I do not think it expedient that you should go there."

The eyes of Rose opened wide in astonishment.

"But why? If it is the home of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and if they deign to invite me—"

"My love, I desire you to trust in my having a good reason for interdicting Carleton House to you, without asking me to explain what that reason is," said the duchess, very gravely.

Rose blushed, coldly, and answered:

"I place myself in your hands, dear madam, and shall feel under too grateful for your kind guidance."

"You will not find me a very stern mentoress, my dear. But here we are at home," said her grace, as the carriage drew up before Bereseligh House.

* * * * * * *

As Appius Claudius gazed upon Virginia, as Sextus gazed upon Lucretia, as Satan gazed upon Eve, so gazed the Royal Satyr of Wales upon the budding beauties of the young baroness.

Hurrying home from St. James', he shut himself up in his closet at Carleton House, and summoned the jackal of his vicious pleasures, the infamous Colonel McElroy, to his presence.

The officer entered, bowing deeply.

"Shut the door, shut the door, and draw near," said the prince.

The officer obeyed, and stood before his master.

"I have seen her, Mac! I have seen her, and by Heaven I am in love in reality for the first time in my life ten years! Her equal in loveliness I have never seen! A Hebe, Psyche and Venus, all in one! Mac, I must have that woman!"

"Your royal highness must have whatever you like; you are the Prince of Wales; but——"

"But—well! But what?"

"She is the Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne.

"But not, upon that account, free from the weaknesses of her sex. Mac, I must have that woman. I do not care what it may cost."

"She is the heiress of fifty thousand pounds a year, your royal highness."

"And not to be purchased by an offer of settlements. I am aware of that. I was not alluding to pecuniary arts, but to the cost of trouble, difficulty, peril to life and character."

The jackal averted his head to make a grimace aside.

"Mac, I depend upon your tact, zeal, and discretion. That ancient dragon, the Duchess of Bereseligh, has never favored Carleton House with her presence, and she will certainly never bring her young beauty either to this place or the houses of any of my friends, where I might possibly meet her. What do you think?"

"I think it extremely probable that your royal highness reasons rightly. The duchess dowager will take no pains to introduce her protegee to your royal highness or your friends. Common rumor says that her grace designs the young heiress for the future Duchess of Bereseligh."

"What, then, would you advise me to do?"

"If your royal highness will deign to listen to me, I think I could propose a plan for bringing you into closer acquaintance with this fair young beauty."

"Very well. Let us hear what your plan is. Come, sit down."

And the conspirators retired to hatch their diabolical plot.

The conversation of other individuals present at the royal drawing-room, who witnessed, with great uneasiness, the sensation created by the appearance of the beautiful young baroness—these were Colonel Hastings and Mr. Hastings.

As soon as they could withdraw they adjourned to a neighboring coffee-house, and, calling for a private room, sat down to discuss the event.

Mr. Hastings opened the conference by exclaiming, in a tone of resentment and anger:

"I love her more than ever! It is not her rank and splendor only, though that is much; it is her exquisite personal loveliness! I saw her once in a cottage girl, in despite of all my pride! And now that I see this rare beauty in its proper setting, now that I see her surrounded with pomp and splendor, the admired of all eyes, the desired of all hearts, I love her with a passion of which I scarcely believed myself capable. I must have her or go mad!"

"Well, you shall have her, if you will only be patient," replied the colonel, coolly.

"Patient, sir! The House of Lords has confirmed her claim to the great Swinburne Baronry! She has been presented at court and received with distinguished honor! She is not only the wealthiest heiress, but the most beautiful girl that has appeared in society for many seasons! She is the favorite of the Duchess of Bereseligh, who, of course, wants her and her fortune for the young duke. She will have many suitors! She will be followed, flattered, and courted in every possible way, before the season is over, she will be affianced to the Duke of Bereseligh!"

"And, if she were so affianced to a royal duke, I have that secret which will break the marriage off," said the colonel, with the same calmness.

"You say that you have this power, sir, and I am convinced you believe you. Why, then, do you not use it at once? There is an old proverb to the effect that 'delays are dangerous.' In this case, with so many rival claimants of her favor, I think delay is doubly dangerous."

"True, in some respects. Yet you have also heard that if delays are dangerous, precipitation often fails. And it would be so in this case, for two reasons. First, she has not had time yet to form in her feelings of resentment toward you. Secondly, she has not had time, either, to become so used to the pomp and splendor of her new rank as to make it a matter of habit and necessity to her. If now I were to attempt to use the power that my secret gives me over her, she would defy me, and some other many-titled lord, at present feeling, she would resign her rank. No, my boy! We must wait until time has softened her anger against you, and confirmed her love for wealth and position. In a word, we must wait until the world has wearied her."

"And how long will that be?" exclaimed the young man, ironically.

"Not many months, my dear boy. And, in the meantime, if there should be a serious probability of her marrying the duke, I shall interview her, interview with her, and, as I said before, even if the bridegroom-elect were a royal duke, I shall break the marriage off."

"I must leave it in your hands, sir," replied Mr. Hastings, and the conversation ended.

* * * * * * *

There was still a third party whose peace was disturbed by the universal homage paid to the beautiful heiress. This was Lady Lester, who, upon her return home, shut herself up in her boudoir to reflect.

"This young baroness has made a decided impression. Ruthven will have many rivals, and he has not been introduced to her yet. I must lose no time in his service. To-morrow I will call at Bereseligh House myself, and leave my card, together with an invitation to an evening party, for—let me see—the twenty-sixth. She can have no engagements so far in advance as that. Ruthven must be introduced to her. Society will throw them frequently into each other's company, and Ruthven, with his handsome person and fascinating address must do the rest."

And so saying, Lady Lester rang for her maid, to divest her of the heavy court dress, and bring her a cup of tea.

Meantime, what effect had the events of the day upon the beautiful and admired subject of all this intoxicating homage; and all these plots and counterplots?

She shall see.

On her return home, Rose threw herself into her dressing-chair, and placed her head in the hands of her maid to be disrobed. While she sat there, she fell into deep thought, saying to herself:

"They tell me that I have made a great sensation, even upon royalty; that I have achieved a great social triumph by simply appearing at the drawing-room of her majesty. They call me the star of the ascendant in the empyrean of fashion; and even if this is so, what is it all to me 'so long as Mordecai, the Jew, sits at the king's gate!'

What is it to me if all the world worships this poor beauty set in a golden frame, since he has no kind word for Rose? I was happier in the country when my claim to the baronry was unsettled, and my fortunes uncertain, for then he was good to me; and now, alas! since my claim has been confirmed, and we have come up to town, he never notices me by any attention beyond what is required by etiquette. I wonder if I have displeased him, or if he has taken a dislike to me? I must not even try to find out. Oh, I am very unhappy!"

And here the adored beauty, the worshipped heiress, the triumphant debutante into court circles, of whom the whole world of fashion was talking with admiration or with envy, dropped her face into her hands and wept passionately.

Mademoiselle Gabrielle, in alarm, brought Hungary water, aromatic vinegar, sal ammonia, and everything else that could think of restoratives, and declared, since she could see no other cause for tears, that the fatigue and excitement of the day had been too much for "milladie." Rose did not contradict her, but composed and recovered herself sufficiently to present a cheerful face at the lunch table, where she had to receive the congratulations of the duchess upon what they considered her great social triumph.

Rose had spoken the truth to herself. Since the confirmation of her claim to the Baronry of Swinburne, and their arrival in London, the young Duke of Bereseligh had avoided the society of the beautiful young heiress as much as he consistently with the courtesy due to his mother's guest. Loving her with an affection de pure and disinterested nature as a sister could cherish for a sister, he wished to leave her free to form an extensive acquaintance with the world of fashion, become a competent judge for her hand, so that, finally, if she should accept his hand, she would do so from the conviction of his comparative merits, and he would have the happiness of knowing her decision to be that of the heart as well as of the judgment as well as of an unwavering heart.

But how was poor Rose to know his generous motive? She knew only that his distant courtesy sent her weeping to her room that day of her great triumph!

The next morning the Duchess of Bereseligh and the Ladies Wardour, together with Lady Etheridge, were engaging over a late breakfast table, and discussing the events of the previous day, when a servant entered with a security! But little shall I care so that right triumphs!"

The next day, when Colonel McElroy solicited a private audience of the Prince of Wales, and laid before his royal highness the request of Lady Etheridge, respectfully declining the post that had been offered to her, the prince fell into a most unprincely fit of profanity, a luxury in which he only indulged in the presence of such familiars as Colonel McElroy.

"And this, then, Mac, is the result of your precious plan! You would suggest nothing more original than that I should make the beauty a lady-in-waiting upon the Princess. I might have known that the old Hecate of Bereseleigh would counsel her to decline the honor. And she has declined it. What has your wisdom to say now?" said the prince, ironically.

"If your royal highness will pardon the most zealous and devoted of your servants, I have another plan," said the jackal.

"Ah, you have! Then let us hear it without much preface."

"It is a plan that, with submission to your Royal Highness, should be discussed with closed doors, as the country say."

"Then close the doors and open your communication at once," said the prince.

The jackal obeyed, and then returned to his master to divulge his second plot for getting the beautiful and innocent young baroness into the prince's power.

CHAPTER XVII.

It was Easter Monday, and the young ladies had a holiday.

Laura Elmer sat alone in the deserted schoolroom reading with much interest a review of the new poem, when Miss Lester suddenly burst in, with a gayly bound volume in her hand, exclaiming:

"Oh, Miss Elmer, here is the 'Album of Beauty,' and the frontispiece is a portrait of that beautiful Baroness Etheridge, whom every one so much admires. Only look at her. What a lovely, lovely face! And they do say she was brought up in a cottage, like Lady Burleigh or the shepherd lord—you recollect. But, oh, do look!

And the eager child spread open the folio before her governess.

"Thank you, dear," said Miss Elmer, letting her languid eyes fall upon the picture.

"And now, Miss Elmer, I thought that would amuse you while we are gone to Richmond with papa. Good-by, dear Miss Elmer."

And, kissing her hand, the volatile creature flew out of the room.

Laura Elmer looked down upon the steel engraving that formed the frontispiece of the "Album of Beauty."

Yes, it was the same lovely face, the same sweet, serious young face, veiled by the same fall of fair ringlets. The attitude was pensive, the graceful head bowed like a fair lily, and resting upon the taper hand. Her costume was rich and gorgeous, as became her rank; but the expression of her softly-closed lips and thoughtful eyes seemed to repeat the words, "I know that this pageantry is passing away. It is but a poor prince-peeress who must fret her hour upon the stage until the farce is over, and then be seen no more."

No such thought crossed the mind of Laura Elmer as she gazed upon the fair portrait. She only looked and loved.

"Shall the world win this sweet creature? Alas, she must be more than woman, more than human, if this sudden elevation, this dazzling success, this bewildering adulation, does not utterly spoil her. She has been in town now many weeks and has not called to see me. Has she already forgotten her fervent expressions of friendship?

Miss Elmer was interrupted by a rap at the door.

"Come in," she said, closing and laying aside the book.

"Good-morning, Miss Elmer. I beg you will pardon my intrusion, and send me off if it is unseasonable," said Mr. Cassinove, entering.

"I am quite at leisure. Pray sit down," replied Laura, smiling to observe that he also had in his hand a book that he was about to offer to her notice.

He bowed and took the proffered seat, saying:

"I have but lately become acquainted with the rare merit of a poem about which the whole literary world has been talking and writing for the last two months. You have not read it. I hope that you will permit me to recommend a work which, to a mind like yours, will richly repay perusal."

And he laid the volume before her. Laura Elmer blushed deeply as she took it up.

"I am much indebted to you for your kindness, Mr. Cassinove. I have been reading this morning what I consider to be the best review that has yet been written upon this poem. Do you like the poem, perhaps you would also like the review," she said, tendering the last number of the Gentleman's Magazine.

It was now Cassinove's turn to blush deeply—so deeply indeed that he met the eyes of Laura Elmer, mutual consciousness flashed from eye to eye, from heart to heart, from soul to soul, suddenly revealing the truth.

"You are the reviewer," said the glance of Laura.

"And you the poet," said that of Cassinove.

The heart of the young man beat quickly. His color went and came.

"I might have known it! I might have known it! That glorious poem is but another phase of the poet woman," he thought, and he forgive her he might have said or done is uncertain, for at that instant a door opened and a servant announced,

"Lady Etheridge!"

And the next instant Rose was in the arms of Laura.

Cassinove, with a bow, had quietly retreated from the room.

"I did not say my name in advance, dear Miss Elmer, because I wished so much to see you whether you would or not. Can you forgive me?" inquired Rose, bashfully.

"Most welcome intruder, yes," replied Laura, installing her visitor in the most comfortable chair.

Rose seated herself, glanced at the queenly form of Laura Elmer, arrayed in its simple dress of black serge, and the royal brow with its plain bands of black hair; then at the surroundings, the schoolroom, with the signs of mental drudgery, and burst into a plain hearty laugh.

"What play, my dear?"

"This comedy of 'The Changeling,' in which they make poor Rose take the part of the baroness," she said.

"My dear, how incredulous you are of your good fortune. The history of the past twenty years was indeed a play, as far as you and I were concerned. The history of the present is a reality. Believe it, accept it and improve it."

Rose shook her head sadly, and, pressing her hand upon her bosom, said:

"Ah, Miss Elmer! deep in my heart here I feel how unreal is all I see around me. Yes, Miss Elmer, sooner or later the poor little sparrow will be plucked of her bird-of-paradise plumage, and it will be well if she is not left to shiver and die of cold."

"This is morbid, very morbid, my dear. You really must banish such thoughts," said Laura, so gravely that Rose suddenly laughed, and said:

"But I did not come here to be lectured for croaking, Miss Elmer. I came to see you, to talk over all that has passed since we met, and especially to bring you this book."

And, to the ludicrous astonishment of Laura Elmer, Rose produced the third copy of that poem that had been offered to her.

But Laura drifted easily from the book to other topics, and she and Rose fell into a familiar conversation, talking of much that had passed since they last met, which to relate would only be to repeat events with which the reader is already acquainted.

And Rose terminated her visit—the happiest visit, she declared, that she had made since coming to town.

"There are gleams of sunlight on the shadiest path," said Laura Elmer, when she was left alone; and she fell into a pleasant reverie that lasted until the servant came to announce the carriage for the afternoon drive.

She then quickly put on her bonnet and mantle and went down to the front hall, where she was met by Sir Vincent and Mrs. Ravenscroft.

Laura's position toward Mrs. Ravenscroft was growing daily more embarrassing. Since the day of that unhappy young lady's rencounter with the stranger in the park her conduct had been marked by a singular anxiety and vigilance. This occasion was no exception to the rule, but was destined very much to complicate the duties and perplex the mind of Laura Elmer. The carriage door had scarcely closed upon them when Helen Ravenscroft, keeping her veil down, looked anxiously through every window in turn. As the carriage rolled on, this course of watchfulness was still pursued, until at length, just as they were about to enter the park, the restless woman suddenly became calm and contented.

Laura Elmer looked out and saw the cause of the sudden change. The person whose appearance she had evidently watched and hoped for was at hand—that is to say, the light-haired man was riding in attendance upon the carriage.

Laura Elmer's face flushed with indignation. She suddenly pulled the check-string and ordered the coachman to turn and drive back to the house, but the man, not fully comprehending the unexpected order, only drew up and touching his hat, waited for further directions.

While Miss Elmer was hurriedly repeating her orders from one window Helen Ravenscroft suddenly let down the other, and, snatching a letter from her bosom, threw it out at the feet of the rider, who, leaping from his horse, picked it up, and then springing into his saddle rode rapidly away. Helen dropped back into her seat and burst into a horrible laugh.

"In the name of Heaven, what have you done?" cried Laura Elmer, turning around in dismay.

"What Hades cannot undo! You may betray me now; tell all you know. It will be too late! too late!" replied Mrs. Ravenscroft, with a wild laugh.

"Most unhappy! I fear, indeed, that you have betrayed yourself. I very much regret having concealed your first rencounter with that evil man from Sir Vincent Lester. And I warn you that I feel it my duty to yourself and your family to inform him of that which I have witnessed," said Miss Elmer, gravely.

"I free you to do so, but it will be in vain! In vain! All Hades cannot undo what I have done to-day," said Helen, in exultation.

The carriage rolled rapidly back to Grosvenor Square. When they arrived they were met as usual in the hall by Sir Vincent Lester, who greeted them with much surprise, exclaiming:

"You are back early. No one is ill, I hope?"

"No, Sir Vincent; but as soon as you have disposed of your unhappy charge I must have an interview with you," said Miss Elmer, in a peremptory manner.

"Certainly, Miss Elmer. James, show Miss Elmer into the library; I will attend upon you there immediately, Miss Elmer," said the baronet, leading away Mrs. Ravenscroft, who, in passing, turned upon the governess a look of wild defiance and triumph.

Laura Elmer entered the library, and threw herself into an easy-chair to await the coming of the baronet, who now entered.

He advanced smiling, and saying:

"Miss Elmer, I feel myself much flattered by this mark of confidence. It is an honor—"

"A truce to compliments, if you please, Sir Vincent. Forgive my interruption, but I have that to communicate which may make you serious enough," said Laura Elmer, very seriously.

The baronet bowed, took a seat opposite to her, and became politely attentive.

"What I have to communicate, Sir Vincent, relates to the unhappy young lady from whom we have just parted."

"Helen Ravenscroft!" exclaimed the baronet, in alarm. "She has told you all!"

"She has told me nothing, Sir Vincent. She has confided in me no more than you have."

Laura then related all she knew and had learned regarding Miss Ravenscroft and the mysterious man with fair hair and light-blue eyes.

When she concluded with the most recent incident, in which Miss Ravenscroft had flung a letter from the window and declared that she had done it what could not be undone, the baronet's face turned ghastly white, his head dropped upon his chest—he seemed completely overcome by emotion.

Laura Elmer looked at him in terror, and then started toward the bell-rope, when the baronet arrested her.

"Miss Elmer, there are times when belief is the blasting of the Turks, and the predestinism of the Calvinists, forces itself upon my conviction, and exhibits that we are not only responsible to commit certain crimes, but that every means will be taken to insure that which we have not only learned to respect you, and wish to stand well with you. I pray you, therefore, whatever the next few days may bring forth, judge of me as leniently as you can—as of one who has been 'more sinned against than sinning.' And, with one final request, I will bid you good-morning; and that is, that you will speak of the events of this day to no living soul unless you should be judicially called upon to do so."

Miss Elmer gave the required promise, and retired, full of sad thoughts, from the library.

CHAPTER XVIII.

One morning Rose received a copy of the new edition of the poem that all the world was talking about.

Turning to the title page to discover who had sent it, she burst into an exclamation of joy, with the words:

"Oh, how stupid of me! I should have known it! Why, an idiot might have known that much!"

"What is it, dear Rose?" inquired the duchess.

"Why I ought to have known at once who was the author of 'Woman,' and I was an idiot not to have known it!"

"Oh! the author's name is there! Who is she, then?"

"Why, Laura Elmer, of course! I was very, very dull not to have known it before!"

"Laura Elmer! Your friend, Laura Elmer! She who was brought up and educated as the Baroness Etheridge? Are you sure?" exclaimed the duchess.

"Why, of course, I am sure now. I ought to have been sure at first. Look, your grace!"

And Rose opened the volume, spreading before the duchess the title-page, upon which appeared the words, "Woman: a Poem. By Laura Elmer." And then turning a fly leaf, she exhibited an autograph of the words—"To Rosamond, Baroness Etheridge, with the love of Laura Elmer. June 1st, 1800."

"Laura Elmer! Laura Elmer! whose education and whose antecedents fit her to adorn any circle, and whose genius entitles her to the very highest consideration! Katherine, my dear, sit down immediately, and write her an invitation to our party of the 15th. There is time enough yet, if you send it off immediately. I will call on her myself to-day. She will soon resign her situation—it is ridiculous, a woman of her genius; however, I suppose some may be said to consecrate every station. And I really must secure this new literary star for our party of the 15th! Are you writing the invitation, Katherine?"

"Yes, mamma."

"Well, I am so overjoyed! My dear Miss Elmer! I might have known that she only could have written that poem!" exclaimed Rose, delightedly.

The duchess rang, and ordered her carriage, and then turning to Rose, said:

"I shall call on Miss Elmer this morning; but must leave it to you to persuade her to accept our invitation of the tenth. I can well conceive that a history and Miss Elmer's pride and delicacy may shrink from the idea of appearing in circles which once she might have honored as the Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne, but which she can now grace only as a successful woman of genius. But she loves you, and will come to us if she can be made to feel that it will make you happy."

On the evening of the tenth, the beauty and fashion of the town were assembled at Bereseleigh House. The duchess had informed many of her friends, who had told all the others, that the new star, the unknown poetess, would be present. And among other interesting subjects of conversation, the expected arrival of Miss Elmer was discussed.

At length were successively announced the names:

"Lady Lester," "Mr. Ruthven Lester," and "Miss Elmer." And the party arrived.

Every one knew the Lesters. The lovely woman, on the arm of Sir Vincent Lester could therefore, only be Miss Elmer.

A murmur of irrepressible admiration greeted her appearance as Lady Lester conducted her through the drawing-rooms toward the place where the duchess stood to welcome her guests.

The facts of her antecedents, as well as of her present social rank, were unknown or ignored. That she was Laura Elmer, the poetess, patronised by the duchess of Bereseleigh, and by Lady Lester, was deemed a sufficient passport to the favor of the most exclusive conservator of rank present. That her beauty, dress, and address were all of a very high order, was another recommendation, though probably a less important one.

Lady Lester and Mr. Ruthven Lester never relaxed their polite attentions, and Laura Elmer became the lioness of the evening.

Laura, in returning home with the Lesters, was occupied with one thought.

Shall I see Cassinove to-night, and bid him 'Good-night,' before we retire?"

Her secret hope was gratified. He was standing in the hall when they entered.

Lady Lester was in great good-humor, and came in complimenting Miss Elmer. Seeing Mr. Cassinove, she said:

"Ah, Mr. Cassinove, you should have seen what a sensation our friend created at the Duchess of Bereseleigh's party to-night. Congratulate her, sir."

"The duchess and her friends are rather to be congratulated, madam," said Mr. Cassinove, gravely and sweetly, as he bowed to Laura Elmer.

Their eyes met.

The approbation of one esteemed friend is better than the admiration of the whole world besides," said Laura Elmer, in a tone that made his heart thrill with joy.

"Indeed, sir," she said, holding out her hand, receiving and returning the slight pressure that sent him happier to his home.

Laura Elmer retired to her room; but the adventures of the night were not yet over. In her life of isolation and solitude she had formed the habit of reading in her chamber every night until she became sleepy. For this purpose she always kept a volume on hand. The book now in progress had happened to be "Tristram." Feeling too much excited by the events of the day to go at once to sleep, she looked about for her book, without being able to find it. Then suddenly remembering that she had left it in the drawing-room below stairs, and feeling the more anxious to read it because Cassinove had been out of her sight, she threw on her dressing-gown, took a taper, and went softly down the stairs to repossess herself of her much-loved treasure. The house was quite still; the world seemed buried in the deep arms of the still small hours.

As she reached the lower landing a sudden draught from the open hall door, at the foot of the staircase, blew out the taper. At the same moment, the slight within that door, extinguished, left the whole spot with astonishment. The lights were all out, but, by the smoldering fire of the grate, she saw the figures of two men seated at the writing-tables near the rug. The one with his face fronting the fireplace was Sir Vincent Lester, and even in the red and lurid light of the dying fire his face was ghastly pale, his brows were corrugated, and great drops of agony were beaded upon his forehead.

The other figure was sat with his back toward the door, and, consequently, his face was hidden from Laura Elmer; but by the general contour of his form, and by the peculiar air of his head, and especially by the light hair, she recognised him as the mysterious stranger who had twice met Mrs. Ravenscroft in the park, and whose acquaintance with the family of Sir Vincent seemed, too, as baleful as they were inexplicable.

It took but one instant to impress this strange scene upon the brain of Laura Elmer, and then deeply shocked by what she had inadvertently witnessed, she turned hastily to retrace her steps to her chamber.

In her hurried retreat, a few words from the library reached her ear, the first from Sir Vincent Lester, in a voice half-suffocated with emotion.

"For her sake, then; she loves you."

A derisive laugh from the other was the only reply.

"Oh, Heaven! you would not destroy her!" burst in anguish from Sir Vincent.

"I will give you ten days, and then ——"

Laura heard no more; she had passed out of the reach of hearing.

She gained the privacy of her own room, and with no disposition either to sleep or to read, retired to rest.

CHAPTER XIX.

The long-looked for day of Lady Howarth's rural breakfast and promenade at her superb villa at Richmond came at length.

At an early hour the Duchess of Bereseleigh and her party, consisting of the Baroness Etheridge and the Ladies Wardour, entered their carriages to proceed to the scene of Arcadian festivity.

The morning drive from London to Richmond, along the banks of the beautiful Thames, is through sunny meadows and shady groves, in all the luxuriant verdure of an early summer time, was the purest enjoyment of that season of every that Rose had experienced since leaving her beautiful home at Swinburne Castle.

It was nearly twelve o'clock when they reached the villa, an elevated mansion of white stone, crowning a commanding height above the river. Behind the house stood a tall, close, well-kept wood; before it rolled a green lawn, in all the dewy freshness of June, and adorned by grand old oak trees, standing singly or in groups, at various distances, between the mansion house and the water's edge.

The lawn presented a strange and grotesque scene. Such anachronisms of dress of Miss Elmer's pride and delicacy may shrink from the idea of appearing in circles which once she might have honored as the Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne, but which she can now grace only as a successful woman of genius. But she loves you, and will come to us if she can be made to feel that it will make you happy."

On the evening of the tenth, the beauty and fashion of the town were assembled at Bereseleigh House. The duchess had informed many of her friends, who had told all the others, that the new star, the unknown poetess, would be present. And among other interesting subjects of conversation, the expected arrival of Miss Elmer was discussed.

At length were successively announced the names:

"Lady Lester," "Mr. Ruthven Lester," and "Miss Elmer." And the party arrived.

Every one knew the Lesters. The lovely woman, on the arm of Sir Vincent Lester could therefore, only be Miss Elmer.

A murmur of irrepressible admiration greeted her appearance as Lady Lester conducted her through the drawing-rooms toward the place where the duchess stood to welcome her guests.

The facts of her antecedents, as well as of her present social rank, were unknown or ignored. That she was Laura Elmer, the poetess, patronised by the duchess of Bereseleigh, and by Lady Lester, was deemed a sufficient passport to the favor of the most exclusive conservator of rank present. That her beauty, dress, and address were all of a very high order, was another recommendation, though probably a less important one.

Lady Lester and Mr. Ruthven Lester never relaxed their polite attentions, and Laura Elmer became the lioness of the evening.

Laura, in returning home with the Lesters, was occupied with one thought.

Shall I see Cassinove to-night, and bid him 'Good-night,' before we retire?"

Her secret hope was gratified. He was standing in the hall when they entered.

Lady Lester was in great good-humor, and came in complimenting Miss Elmer. Seeing Mr. Cassinove, she said:

"Ah, Mr. Cassinove, you should have seen what a sensation our friend created at the Duchess of Bereseleigh's party to-night. Congratulate her, sir."

"The duchess and her friends are rather to be congratulated, madam," said Mr. Cassinove, gravely and sweetly, as he bowed to Laura Elmer.

Their eyes met.

The approbation of one esteemed friend is better than the admiration of the whole world besides," said Laura Elmer, in a tone that made his heart thrill with joy.

"Indeed, sir," she said, holding out her hand, receiving and returning the slight pressure that sent him happier to his home.

Laura Elmer retired to her room; but the adventures of the night were not yet over. In her life of isolation and solitude she had formed the habit of reading in her chamber every night until she became sleepy. For this purpose she always kept a volume on hand. The book now in progress had happened to be "Tristram." Feeling too much excited by the events of the day to go at once to sleep, she looked about for her book, without being able to find it. Then suddenly remembering that she had left it in the drawing-room below stairs, and feeling the more anxious to read it because Cassinove had been out of her sight, she threw on her dressing-gown, took a taper, and went softly down the stairs to repossess herself of her much-loved treasure. The house was quite still; the world seemed buried in the deep arms of the still small hours.

As she reached the lower landing a sudden draught from the open hall door, at the foot of the staircase, blew out the taper. At the same moment, the slight within that door, extinguished, left the whole spot with astonishment. The lights were all out, but, by the smoldering fire of the grate, she saw the figures of two men seated at the writing-tables near the rug. The one with his face fronting the fireplace was Sir Vincent Lester, and even in the red and lurid light of the dying fire his face was ghastly pale, his brows were corrugated, and great drops of agony

Two Feet in Stockings

SHAPE GIVING

ONE OF THE 14

A homely foot can be made handsome by clever dressing. This is true of the face and the figure; why not of the foot?

Being copies of Perfect Feminine Feet the Dolly Varden is a shape giving shoe. It will not succeed in giving to every foot all of the delicate shape and smartness of the perfect Human Foot from which it was copied. We could not claim so much as that. But we do claim that in seven cases out of ten the Dolly Varden shoe will give the foot of its wearer most of the clever lines and exquisite form of the original chef d'oeuvre from which it is a replica.

Is it worth while trying on a few pairs to ascertain what effect they may have on the appearance of your feet? Is it worth while to gamble a little time which may perhaps convert foot homeliness to foot smartness? Purchasers or investigators equally welcome. In both Canada and the States—$3.50 and $4.00. Every pair Goodyear Welted.

emerald ring of great value. The crowd pressed forward to see it; and Lady Etheridge felt herself forcibly separated from the Duchess of Bereseleigh, and carried onward toward the wheel. Her number was called out. Expectation was at its full vive. She drew, and obtained the first prize—a gold locket set around with diamonds of inestimable value.

She blushed deeply at her success, and turned the jewels as if in search of the secret of opening it, when she felt herself touched upon the shoulder. She turned and saw a lady masked and in the costume of Minerva, with helmet, shield and spear, standing near her, who stooped and whispered:

"It opens with a spring; press the diamond there under the ring and it will fly open; but do not open it here."

Rose, disturbed by being addressed by a stranger, looked around for her party, but could not see them anywhere. The crowd had entirely cut her off from their company.

"You are in search of the Duchess of Bereseleigh? I will conduct you to her side," said the masked lady.

"Thank you; I shall be very much obliged," answered Rose.

"Follow me, then, if you please," said the unknown, leading the way—first through the drawing-room, where the lottery had just ended, thence through a room fitted up with musical instruments of every description, and in which a number of opera singers were performing for the amusement of a portion of the company, to the door of an adjoining apartment, which she opened, saying:

"The duchess has gone into this room to rest and refresh herself; enter and you will find her."

Rose crossed the threshold and found herself in a luxurious apartment, fitted up in the Turkish style with ottomans, cushions and other voluptuous accessories. In the midst of the room stood a richly-gilded table, laden with rare wines, fruits, jellies, sweetmeats, etc. There was no one in the apartment, and Rose looked around, expecting the reappearance of the Duchess of Bereseleigh. Before she had, perhaps, only only retired for a few moments. Rose felt no uneasiness, but seating herself upon an ottoman, touched the spring of the locket, for the purpose of examining it. The case flew open and revealed the miniature of the prince, set in brilliants. On the reverse side were the words: "L'Amour est l'Ange du Monde."

Flushing with confusion and alarm, Rose started to leave the room and seek the duchess elsewhere, when her purpose was prevented by the entrance of a gentleman in the costume of Phœbus Apollo, who advanced toward her, saying:

"Apollo greets Aurora, the Sun salutes the Morning Star."

"The Morning Star always disappears with the rising of the Sun," answered Rose, gliding toward the door.

"Nay, pause, beautiful one! He is no stranger that addresses you, Beauteous!" And the unknown lifted his mask, revealing his features.

The pale face of Rose beat with agitation and terror; yet controlling herself by a great effort, she courtesied deeply to the heir of the crown, and speaking with the most respectful coldness, said:

"I am fortunate in having this opportunity of returning to your royal highness a jewel which could only have reached my hands through the greatest mistake."

And she laid the locket on the table before him, and turned to leave the room.

But he took her hand and reseated her upon the ottoman, saying:

"Nay, retain the gift, most beautiful Rose, and behold the giver at your feet."

And then, with the grace, fervor and elegance of which he was the perfect master, he told, to perhaps the hundredth hearer, the oft-repeated tale of his unchangeable love—a prince's love.

"'A prince's love!' a prince's insult!' an insult as deep, coming from your royal highness, as though it had been offered by the lowest hand in your dominions!" exclaimed Lady Etheridge, indignantly.

And so saying, with her beautiful countenance exalted to fervid enthusiasm, Lady Etheridge passed from the room, while the eyes of the prince followed her with a gaze full of admiration, wonder and reverence.

He did not attempt to detain her; persuasion, not force, was the weapon of the prince.

This admiration of her virtues only strengthened his desire to win her heart. He pulled the bell-rope impatiently, and a page entered.

"Send my equerry hither," was the order of his royal highness.

The page bowed low and disappeared.

A few minutes elapsed, and Colonel McElroy entered the presence with a deep reverence.

The prince regarded him with an angry and sarcastic expression, saying:

"I have to congratulate you, sir, on the eminent success of your second stratagem!"

"Your royal highness has at least received a private interview with the lady, which was all that I could pledge myself for," replied the equerry, bending lowly.

"And this is the result!" said the prince, angrily taking up and throwing down the locket. "She has returned my gift with a gratuitous lecture."

"Perhaps a more costly offering would have been more successful."

"I do not believe she can be bought!"

"Pardon me, your royal highness did not, perhaps, bid high enough."

"I do not believe she can be bought!" angrily repeated the prince.

"Pardon, once more, your royal highness; but one who knew this world right well declared that every man had his price, and I have never yet met the woman who had not here. It is but a question of more or less expense, of shorter or longer time."

"I offered her the rank of a duchess."

"She is likely to obtain it honorably, and without the aid of your royal highness."

"What, then, was left for me to do? I could not tempt her with a rank of a princess and the prospective rank of a queen."

"No, your royal highness; it is rather too late in the day for that."

"What, then, was to be done? What the deuce do you mean by your talk of the conquest of this woman being a matter of more or less expense, and of shorter and of longer time? I care nothing for expense, but a great deal for time! I must win that girl, whatever it may cost, McElroy! but I must win her soon! By my soul, she is the most enchanting creature I ever saw! Tell me, what is to be done?"

"If your royal highness would trust me——"

"What! after two failures?"

"With submission to your royal highness, I would humbly suggest that this second stratagem has scarcely been a failure on my part, since it has accomplished all that it promised—a private interview with the lady, an opportunity of pleading your cause to her ideas."

"That is true; and if my pleadings proved unsuccessful, you are not to be blamed, I suppose!" said the prince.

McElroy bowed in answer, adding:

"Nor should your royal highness be discouraged with the manner in which the lady met your advances. She was unprepared, surprised; she was not, perhaps, so accustomed to be wooed as your royal highness is to winning, and, perhaps, you had not succeeded in her price."

"Then why the deuce do you not discover it for me? What else do I keep you for?" demanded the provoked prince.

"To serve your royal highness to the best of my poor ability, as becomes your humble servant; and, if your royal highness will deign to leave this affair exclusively in my hands, giving me authority to conduct it as I see fit, I think I can pledge myself to bring it to a successful issue."

"Then I give you a carte blanche to do as you please in this matter, with one proviso, that you do nothing unworthy of the prince."

"On my head be it if I do!" exclaimed the jealous and unscrupulous instrument of the royal-pleasures and vices, as he mentally formed, against the peace and honor of Lady Etheridge, a plan the most diabolical that ever entered the head of man or fiend.

Meantime, the subject of this plot, hurrying through the music-room and semi-obscurity of the drawing-room, everywhere sought Lucie, the Duchess of Bereseleigh, whom she found at last at the ball door.

"Well, my love, I have been seeking you all over the house and the grounds for the last two hours; but believing you to be most probably within the villa, I took my position here like any porter, as the most likely place to see you as you should pass out. But what on earth is the matter? You are pale and trembling. You are agitated. You are ill. What has happened to alarm or distress you, my love?" exclaimed the duchess, on observing the greatly disturbed appearance of her friend.

"Oh, madam, let us go hence! let us return home at once!" exclaimed Rose, excitedly.

"Willingly; it has been a pleasant day upon the whole, but, I am quite tired. I will not ask you for an explanation of your distress until we have reached the privacy of your own dressing-room at Bereseleigh House," said her grace.

The carriages were ordered, and the duchess and her party prepared to return.

While they stood waiting, the duchess sought to cheer her drooping young friend. Pointing to the beautiful and varied landscape of hill and dale, and grove and river, all bathed in the clear sunlight of a June afternoon, she said:

"Do but look up, Rose! What a glorious day! With what a lively green the fields and groves are clothed; how deeply blue and clear the sky, how high the dome of heaven."

Rose looked up and heaved a sigh.

"Ah, madam, so I thought when we came out this morning. Now, alas! I might say with Hamlet, 'All that is not heavily with this disposition, that this goodly frame, the earth, seems to me a sterile promontory; this most excellent canopy, the air—look—you—this brave, o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire—why it appears no other thing to me than a foul and pestilent congregation of vapors.'"

The carriages now came up; the duchess and her party entered, and were driven home to Bereseleigh House.

Her grace lost no time in seeking Lady Etheridge in the dressing-room of the latter.

"Now, my love, that we are alone, you may tell me what so distressed you at the villa."

"Oh, madam,—an event that makes it necessary for me to leave your service to absolve me from my promise of spending the season with you, and to sacrifice my present return to the Swinburne Castle," said Rose, excitedly.

"Explain, my love," said the duchess.

Lady Etheridge, with deep blushes, commenced, and related the details of her enforced interview with the prince.

"Ah, I see it all now. The breakfast, the masked promenade, the lottery, all was got up for the especial purpose of bringing about your meeting with his royal highness. There are men, and women, too, I am sorry to say, of the highest rank, who thus lend themselves to the purposes of royalty. You are right, my love, we must leave town; but we shall turn not to Castle Swinburne Castle, but to Bereseleigh Court, where I shall still claim you as my guest," said the duchess.

And this course was immediately decided upon. But an unforeseen event that shall be related in the next chapter prevented the contemplated journey, and turned the fate of our heroine.

CHAPTER X.

The next morning, while Lady Etheridge was engaged in giving directions to her maid in regard to the packing and locking of her costly jewelry, preparatory to her journey into the country, a letter was left before her door. On opening, she found to be the appointment of herself as maid of honor to the Queen, with command to her to repair immediately to Windsor, where the court was then residing.

With the letter in her hand, Rose went to the dressing-room of the duchess, and, being admitted, put it into her hands.

"My dear, this is fortunate. You need not say one word of the court of Queen Charlotte will be a refuge," said the duchess, with a smile.

Rose colored that smile with a brighter one. Young, beautiful, wealthy and noble—queen of beauty and of fashion—for first London season—such she was well pleased to be delivered from the necessity of leaving town at the very acme of her social triumph.

"You need not countermand your packing, my dear, as you may need your wardrobe to Windsor with you, of course," said the duchess.

"When should I leave?" inquired Rose.

"To-morrow afternoon, at farthest. I shall go down to-day and to-morrow. Now, run away and superintend your preparations."

And the interview closed.

The evening of the same day a tall, thin, dark figure of a man, with his coat collar turned up and his hat pulled low over his brow, might have been seen treading some the narrowest courts and alleys of the most dilapidated old parts of the central London. He paused before a great, dilapidated house, that had, in the olden times, been the town mansion of a proud prelate; but, long fallen from its high estate, was a tenement crowded with beggars, trampers and thieves, who, after pursuing, all day long, their nefarious trades through the streets, retired here at night, some to eat, drink and sleep, some to concert new plans of robbery, and others to hide from the pursuit of the law, for as yet the character of this house was unknown to the police, and its moldering walls yet afforded sure refuge for fugitives.

"Disgusting place! Whatever can Roberts be hiding for now! For nothing that has brought him much profit, or he would not be perdu here; he would be out of the country," said the man, as he entered the wide, open hall door, and picked his way, loathingly, along a filthy passage and up a broad staircase, common to all the tenants of the building, and as filthy as the foulest outside alley, or the most neglected stable yard. The only modification was that on the carpetless landing the dirt was a little less thick and moist, as though the adhering contaminations from without had somewhat fly fallen off from ascending footsteps. From the open doors of every room in this house squalid children tumbled in and out, and the querulous voices of angry, drunken, or suffering men and women were heard.

Through all this the visitor passed up to the third floor, and turned to a door on the right, and gave a peculiar rap.

"Come in," said a very pleasant, manly voice.

The visitor entered a large front room, dark, dingy and meanly furnished, yet free from the dirt that defiled the lower rooms and passages.

"Eh! what the devil, Roberts; that was your voice, but where are you?" inquired he, looking about him in the semi-obscurity of the apartment.

"Here," answered the same clear, soft voice, as the owner emerged from some dark corner and opened the window shutters, letting in a sufficiency of light to render the room and its meagre furniture—a large, four-posted bed, with dark and tattered green curtains, a worm-eaten oak table, rickety chairs, and so forth.

The occupant was a well-dressed, handsome, fair-haired man, with a sweet, happy and candid expression of countenance.

"Welcome, most noble Mac, to the old palace of the lord bishops of Ely. It is many centuries since the followers of a court hooped you out with their presence," said the inmate of this room, advancing to meet him visitor.

"Eh, good Roberts, William, what has brought you, the greatest epicurean in town, to this beastly place?" exclaimed the latter, with disgust.

Necessity, good Mac; necessity which knows no law. But I may ask, in my turn, what has brought you, most assiduous courtier of the day into this same beastly place?"

"Remedy, the same necessity; proximately your note of this morning."

"Ay, my note. I wrote to you by a trusty messenger to send me ten pounds; I thought you would have sent it."

"I chose to bring it. I have been for days in search of you, and considered myself very lucky this morning in receiving your note."

"Then brought it cost you ten pounds," laughed the fair-haired man.

"Even so," said the other, going to the door and securing it. "Then, returning to the side of William Roberts, he said:

"I wish to engage you in an enterprise of some danger, but much profit."

"You know, Mac," said he, softly spoken man, "that danger is a decidedly objectionable element in any enterprise in which I am to be engaged."

"Oh, I know, William, that courage is not among your vices, but avarice is particularly one against which it battues; and this adventure, if it has the least spice of danger, has also the largest promise of profit."

"Explain."

"I will, darkly. For instance, a certain nobleman has become desperately enamored of a certain beautiful girl, without parents or guardians to interfere with his suit, and yesterday the girl upon account of our national prejudice in favor of a man having but one wife, refused to be won on any other terms. To-morrow afternoon this girl takes a journey to Windsor in a post chaise, with no attendant but her maid and footman. She must be waylaid and carried off."

The fair-haired, soft-spoken man shook his head, murmuring:

"Ugly business! ugly business! Is your nobleman privy to this proceeding?"

"Nay, now, William, you do not show your usual perspicacity. My lord will do nothing, and permit nothing to be done, unworthy of a nobleman."

"But yet he would avail himself of any circumstance that placed this girl in his power?"

"Nay, I do not even say that; but what I say is, that I shall place this beauty in his power, and give him the opportunity and the choice of playing the desperate lover or the magnanimous hero."

"Perilous! but what aid do you require from me myself alone?"

"Such aid only as shall make you 'personally' perfectly safe. You must remain in the city or sight of court residute companions. They must start for Windsor to-morrow afternoon, and you must ride on to Hounslow Heath. There at some convenient place, they must disguise themselves and mask themselves, and lie in wait for the post chaise containing this girl and her servants, stop it, and bring the lady and maid themselves, the girl. This must be effected without bloodshed, and with as little violence as possible."

"Difficult, my dear Mac! very difficult! But my own part seems to be very easy. You would send me two these fellows, and, I suppose, be their paymaster."

"Nay, not quite so easy as that, either, William. You and I must go down to Hounslow Heath a little farther on to-morrow afternoon, and remain there in search Hounslow Heath. There at some convenient place, they must disguise and mask themselves, and lie in wait for the post chaise containing this girl and her servants, stop it, and bring the lady and maid themselves, the girl. This must be effected without bloodshed, and with as little violence as possible."

"Difficult, my dear Mac! very difficult! But my own part seems to be very easy. You would send me two these fellows, and, I suppose, be their paymaster."

"Nay, not quite so easy as that, either, William. You and I must go down to Hounslow Heath a little farther on to-morrow afternoon, and remain there in search of the highest honor. He would never countenance violence in these ruffians, for instance, after carrying off the beauty, were to carry her to him, she would be sent to him to honor his friends, and they would be transported for their pains. But if you and myself should be fortunate as to rescue this beauty from the hands of the robbers, at a spot near to the nobleman, and carry her to that house as a safe refuge for the night, there is now in the house a lady most likely to be found receiving her with the most exigent hospitality, and rendering her gallant deliverers with princely munificence."

"With 'princely munificence!' I understand it all now, my dear Mac! 'Pray understand no more than is necessary to carry out our plans, which you may have only the least flavor of the spice of danger for your friends, and none at all for yourself, you have only to help me to rescue a young lady from the power of thieves, who will be instructed only to make a show of resistance. You will have all the glory and profit, and none of the danger."

"Humph! And this profit, dear Mac!"

"Five hundred pounds, when the lady is safe at Howlett-Close, the country house of which I spoke."

"I am your man, dear Mac. And now, as it is dangerous without for me to emerge from my inner obscurity, I will go out and beat up my companions in the moon,' I have to get back into my grave, this house, as soon as it is light enough. Ah, Mac! times have changed since you and I served together in the Forty-fifth. I have gone down, down; down; step, step, by step, I hide in the darkness of an old rookery; you bask in the sunshine of a court."

"It is your own fault, William. You have talents and genius for anything, are too effeminate, too much afraid of labor, pain, and danger. What you would do well done is profound secrecy, and is done with so much caution and hesitation as to defeat its purpose. If you had a enemy, William, that you were obliged to get rid of, you would not challenge him and run him through the body, as I should, because you would not like to see his blood flow, and would very much dislike to have your own spilled. You would get rid of your enemy by administering to him some slow, sweet poison, that should bring on a gentle decline, and easy, painless death. Nay, I could even imagine you sitting by the bed, smoothing his pillow, and administering the last fours of that enemy whom you had so gently conducted to death, and are so benevolent as not to offer to minate."

The fair-haired man smiled softly and replied, murmuring:

"You were always a flatterer, dear Mac; even before you dreamed of becoming a courtier."

They shook hands and parted.

"A powerful nobleman who feels himself driven to an act for which he does not know whether he shall be rewarded or punished by the personage called Mac, as he descended the stairs.

That same evening the Duchess of Bereseleigh and family were due at Lester House, and Lady Lester received her "dear five hundred friends." They went early, knowing that the next early And, indeed, the two young women—the antipodes of the social world —met, to be "the observed of all observers"—Rosamond, Lady Etheridge of Swinburne, a snow-white, golden-haired, blue-eyed and fairy-sylphed beauty; and Laura Elmer, the governess, a tall, dark, brilliant brunette and genius—the poetess of the day.

The humble position of Miss Elmer was not known or suspected by any of the families of Bereseleigh and Lester.

Lady Lester, as I said, patronized Miss Elmer as the intimate friend of the governess of Etheridge, and society accepted Miss Elmer at the hands of Lady Lester.

The evening, as usual, the Duke of Bereseleigh avoided Lady Etheridge, and gathered his own immediate circle around by a troop of adorers, while he himself divided his attentions impartially among the ladies of his acquaintance present.

Rose was principally surrounded by aspirants to the hands of widowers and their anxious mothers and sisters; and Laura by old litterateurs, who, for the sake of curiosity, jealousy and admiration, welcoming a newcomer into their (Of course) charmed circle, and a brilliant woman, or were proud of a poetical celebrity.

The duchess, absent at present, but looking so ill and so preoccupied as to draw upon himself the notice and the assiduous attentions of the gentleman present, until at length, Lady Lester, observing these things, went and spoke gently to the duchess, who should plead indisposition, and retire. And Sir Vincent, glad to escape, immediately followed her example.

Lady Lester, in watching the movements of Sir Vincent for the last few days, was in serious anxiety for his health and reason; and could find but one solution for the problem.

"He is in love with Miss Elmer. These dark-haired people are very unreasonable, impulsive and unreasonable, and difficult to be restrained by church or state; I am sure, of the two evils, I would rather the girl should encourage him a little than that he should be looking and acting so strangely as to draw upon himself the astonishments of all our friends," she thought.

While Lady Lester was thus seeking and not finding out the true explanation of the baronet's uneasiness, her son Ruthven Lester, by patience and perseverance, by watching and avoiding himself of the first opportunity, had succeeded in separating Lady Etheridge from all others, and leading her into the recess of a bay window, where, with a beating heart, and no man, on admirable terms with himself, he declared his passion, and made a formal offer of his hand.

Lady Etheridge, inwardly amused at his self-conceit, thanked him for the honor he did her, but—. She begged leave to decline it. And when the young gentleman would have pressed his suit, she terminated the interview by rising and joining the company.

And soon after the Duchess of Bereseleigh ordered her carriage, and they returned home.

An engagement to a breakfast given by the Hon. Mrs. Hobart, at her villa, near Fulham, engaged the forenoon of the next day, so that it was between four and five o'clock that Lady Etheridge, accompanied only by her maid, entered her carriage to set out for Windsor. The ride that afternoon was through one of the most beautiful suburbs of the town, and up over the green meadows and shady groves beyond the river, and it was quite dark when the carriage reached Hounslow, and stopped to water the horses at the hotel.

"We wish to reach Windsor in good time to-night. Are the roads safe?" asked the postboy.

"Ay, sy, the roads be well enough; but there have been a highway robbery raise passed the heath for the last week that hasn't been stopped by footpads. And as there be some desperate-looking characters wept by here a couple of hours ago. You'd a deal better stay where you be all night," answered the ostler, as he held a pail of water for the "nigh" horse to drink.

The latter part of this speech counteracted the former, for the coachman immediately came to the conclusion that there lurked in the interested motive in this forewarning; so, instead of announcing it to Lady Etheridge, he replied:

"Oh, I think we will try to get on, at least as far as Maidenhead, where we can sleep if necessary." And gathering up his reins, he drove on.

They were soon out upon the open heath, where nothing could be more weird, dreary and desolate than the aspect of heaven and earth. The sky was overclouded, dark, and lowering—not a single star was visible. The heath was bare, lone, and shadowy, from the murky centre to the obscured horizon. The only sound was that of the solitary carriage, as it rolled along the night road. Yet no sense of fear troubled the heart of Lady Etheridge; she had heard none of the rumors of outlaws, footpads, and was ignorant of the warning given by the people at Hounslow. She was lying back in the carriage, indulging in that dreamy, luxurious state induced by being carried along with an easy, rapid motion through the darkness, when suddenly and silently the carriage was stopped and surrounded by dark, masked figures. Lady Etheridge, her heart paralyzed with extreme terror, sat transfixed and speechless, while her maid uttered scream upon scream. The same instant the coachman fired one shot from his double-barreled pistol, and was about to fire another when he was mastered and disarmed.

"Yield quietly, and no harm shall befall you!" said one of the assailants, as they threw down and gagged and bound the struggling man.

The door of the carriage was then opened, and the inmates summoned to come forth.

Lady Etheridge, controlling her excessive terror, drew off her diamond ring, coolly put her watch and chain, purse

DON'T USE GREASY LINIMENTS.

A century ago they were popular. To-day people want something easier to apply, cleaner in results, and above all a clean liniment. When Nerviline is applied aches and pains disappear as the pores absorb its soothing healing power. Nerviline penetrates instantly, the core of the pain, eases instantly, and leaves no ugly load of poisons behind. Good to take in, capital to rub on, and five times as powerful in destroying pain than any oily liniment. Don't fail to get a large 25c bottle.

ACQUITTED.

A young Englishman, aged 19, working in the Paisley Block factory, recently hired a bicycle from W. J. Norman, and borrowed a pair of pants from a fellow employee, stating that he was going over to see his father in Englesbarton, at Union cheese factory, near Wyder Osborne Station. About two miles from town he punctured the tire, so left the machine at a house on the York Road, and proceeded on foot. He stayed with the friends over night, and the next day being wet he did not go to work. The police soon were surprised to find himself before the bench charged with stealing the pants. He was sent to jail for a week and let out on suspended sentence. The lad refused to do, when on testing his innocence of any intention to steal, the owner of the pants, Mr. Pratt, gave him an excellent character for honesty, etc. The magistrate, however, found him guilty on both charges, and after passing sentence for a week, committed him to jail for a month, the latter matter was referred to the Minister of Justice, says on a review of the evidence, the prisoner's immediate release was ordered by the Governor General. Mr. Pratt acquittance took the boy back into his employment.

I. EARLE, Manager

An Australian Discovery

BENEFITS THE CIVILIZED WORLD.

CAPTAIN COOK'S FIRST VIEW OF AUSTRALIA.

EXPLORERS have found that the healthiest races of the world at the time of their discovery used roots and herbs as medicines. Christoper Columbus would have died when he discovered Jamaica but for the herbal medicines the natives brought him. When Captain Cook discovered Australia, various roots and herbs were used as medicines by the natives. So effective were they that he wrote :—"I did not observe (amongst the native) any appearance of disease, or eruption, or bodily complaint. Very old men, without hair and teeth, showed no sign of decrepitude and were full of vivacity." Now, if vegetable remedies are thus powerful when taken in crude form, how much more so must they be when concentrated and purified as in Bileans? Bileans, the great Australian herbal remedy, are compounded from the finest medicinal roots and herbs yet known, and everywhere where they have been introduced have rapidly displaced the old-fashioned and often harmful liver and stomach medicines containing various mineral poisons. Bileans cure Constipation, Indigestion, Piles, Headache, Debility, and all Liver and Stomach ailments. (See paragraph below.)

AN AUSTRALIAN NATIVE.

Bileans are so compounded that they operate directly upon the liver and stomach. Most medicines taken for—say, constipation, cause purging more or less violent, clearing the intestines out for the time being, but leaving the cause of the constipation untouched. Bile is the natural purgative of the body, and by thus working on nature's lines Bileans effect a cure in nature's own way. In consequence a permanent cure results from their use not a merely temporary relief. Just so in indigestion and all stomach troubles. Bileans do not, like ordinary medicines, merely remove the fermenting food. To do that is to give relief certainly, but it is no cure. Bileans tone up the secreting glands of the stomach and intestines, regulate the flow of gastric juice, stimulate the muscles of the digestive organs to healthy action, and thus remove the root causes of digestive disorders. Bileans always act mildly, never cause griping, are suitable for the most delicate constitution, and do not create the pill-taking habit. For full list of what they cure see paragraph below.

A Free Box

To enable you to test Bileans at our expense, we will send you a free sample box. Cut out this coupon and mail it to Bilean Co., Toronto, with one cent stamp (to pay return postage) and full name and address.

"The Beaver," Napanee, Nov. 2d, 1906.

TESTIMONY FROM PEOPLE YOU MAY KNOW

Mrs. J. Peck, 10 Cornwall St., Toronto, says :—"For nearly two years I was troubled with biliousness and gas around the heart. Sometimes I had such a smothering sensation as if I were going to die any day. When I had had attack Bileans were recommended to me, and I tried them thoroughly. They gave me speedy relief and effected a cure. I think they are a splendid remedy."

Mrs. J. Whitfield, of Swan Lake, Man., says :—"Bileans have done me a wonderful amount of good. I can hardly describe how bad I felt before I took them. I could not eat but that it caused pain. There was a constant sensation of tightness in my side, and my liver was entirely out of order. I could not sleep at nights, suffered also from kidney trouble, and was altogether in a very sorry condition. I had been ailing in this way for years, and I was beginning to find that Bileans were equal to my case." Mrs. J. H. Thompson, of Pentard Park, says :—"For regularity and powerful action, I can highly recommend Bileans. They proved a great benefit to me and restored me when I had been very ill and despondent."

Mrs. Wm. Hall, of Deux Lake, says :—"I have proved Bileans very good for constipation, from which I suffered a great deal. They cured me."

What Bileans Cure

Bileans cure Indigestion, Constipation, Piles, Biliousness, Liver Complaint, Headache, Debility, Anæmia, Female Ailments, Dizziness, Wind, pains in the Chest and between the shoulders, Blood Impurities, Pale Bloodless Complexions, Palpitation, Sleeplessness, Heat Flushes, and all ailments arising out of defective bile flow and assimilation. They are also useful for rheumatism, sciatica, etc., and by toning up the system enable it to throw off colds, chills, etc.

Bileans are obtainable from all druggists at fifty cents a box. Post free from the Bilean Co., Colborne Street, Toronto, upon receipt of price. 6 boxes for $2.50.

MODERN LAND OF EGYPT

COUNTRY OF PHARAOHS SEEN THROUGH CANADIAN GLASSES.

Contrast With Youthful Fancy of Bald Facts and the Real Actual Scenes of the Wonderful Land Watered by the Nile — The Egyptian Season — Old Alexandria Gone—In Cairo, the Khedive's Capital.

How far away the banks of the Nile seemed to us as school children! When the teacher recounted the interesting story of the infant Moses; his having been cast upon the waters; his rescue by Pharaohs daughter. It all seemed a delightful fairy tale concerning a far, nebulous land and few expected to stand upon the actual spot where tradition says the great Deliverer was rescued. Nor did many of us then contemplate that we would ever behold the mysterious pyramids or look into the silent tombs of those mighty Kings who ruled Egypt when the Holy Family fled there for safety and shelter. These scenes so absorbing to our youthful fancies, connected as they were so intimately with our religious teaching, seemed so remote and inaccessible that few ventured to obtain even more than a general idea of the story, without thought of ever visiting the actual scenes of this wonderful drama.

In those days the world seemed very large and Egypt a distant land. There was no cable then, no ocean greyhound, no seventy-mile-an-hour train, writes Charles T. Long in The Toronto Globe. Jules Verne was thought a dreamer and juvenile romancer, when he predicted a trip round the world in eighty days, which may now be undertaken with comfort in sixty. To-day, thanks to electricity and enterprise, there are no remote corners of the earth. An incident of importance Egypt has to offer Cairo, Tokio or London is chronicled at Toronto with the same facility as at New York, Winnipeg or Vancouver. The Nile, down which the infant Moses glided, and which for long ages refused to divulge its mysteries, is to-day an open book to the thousands of Europeans, Americans and Canadians who have learned to regard as facts many of the Biblical accounts long considered legendary.

The Egyptian Season.

"From November to April" is the reply you receive when the tourist agent who knows his business is requested to furnish information regarding the proper time to visit the land of the Pharaohs. During these months the weather is most delightful. Bright sunshine every day, with a temperature ranging from 65 in the morning to 84 at noon and cool enough to sleep with a blanket covering. Sunshine, fragrant flowers, green fields, historic scenes of engrossing interest, every possible form of comfort and amusement, these are some of the many attractions Egypt has to offer the health and pleasure seeker during the winter months when bleak winds, snow and ice make life a burden at home.

Splendid steamers sailing from Boston and New York and touching at Alexandria after having visited the Azores, Gibraltar, Genoa and Naples, complete the journey in less than a week.

Modern Alexandria, with two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, is the chief commercial centre of northern Africa and rivals Constantinople as a cosmopolitan city. It presents little of the aspect of the typical Egyptian. Its spacious streets, teeming with activity, its shops filled with European merchandise, its Board of Trade, occupied by shouting, gesticulating speculators, of English, Greek, French, German, Christian, Turkish and native nationalities, all tend to disappoint the visitor who expected to land and find caravans of camels ready to start for the great desert to the south.

Old Alexandria Gone.

Alexandria presents few evidences of her ancient glory. Nothing is to be seen of her renowned library, nor the forts and battlements erected by the famous warriors whose exploits furnished the world with so much poetry and prose. There are some splendid public modern works, large hotels, beautiful gardens, handsome palaces, great docks, well-equipped railway terminals, up-to-date waterworks, etc., but outside the house where Napoleon made his headquarters there is nothing of particular historic interest. The merchants are chiefly Greeks, who also possess a large proportion of the tobacco trade of the country. Egypt is celebrated the world over for the excellence of her cigarettes, and yet there is not an ounce of tobacco grown in Egypt; but that is another story, and will be dealt with under the head of "British Rule" in a future letter.

Cairo, the capital, is one hundred and twenty miles southeast of Alexandria. The intervening country forms the delta of the Nile, and is rich in agricultural products. Midway between the cities is the village of Roestta, where the French discovered the stone, now to be seen in the British Museum, London, upon which is inscribed in Greek and Egyptian a decree which furnished the key to the hieroglyphics to be found on the thousands of monuments and manuscripts throughout the country. Since discovery Egyptologists have been able to master the ancient language, and are daily translating the messages of the sages of old to those who are interested three thousand years after their time.

In the Khedive's Capital.

Cairo, the seat of government, the home of the Khedive, the residence of Lord Cromer, the British representative, is a city of 60,000, about one-twentieth of whom are foreigners. The city is unique, presenting as it does the most modern improvements in sanitation, buildings, bridges, tram cars, waterworks, etc., side by side with ancient architecture, methods of locomotion, and transportation seraglios concealed gardens, mosques and various other eastern institutions. In the European quarters one might imagine oneself in London or Paris were it not for the thousands of Orientals, costumed in the flowing and beautifully-colored robes of the far east, who jostle the foreigners as they hurry from place to place, or take possession of the seats on the pavement surrounding the numerous cafes. Leaving this familiar scene, it is only necessary to cross the Central Square to plunge immediately into the native district, where Europe is left a thousand years behind, and where the whole aspect of things changes as though by magic. Here the streets are narrow. The houses are very high, the top stories built out so as to meet and form an arch, through which the sun and heat may not penetrate. The crowds swarm like bees about a hive. The workmen operate the same style of tools as those found in the tombs of the ancients at Luxor. Here may be seen artisans producing swords, brass, silver and gold work, mosaics, beaded and silk ware, jewellery, rugs and a hundred other precious and curious things, reproductions of the wonders the Queen of Sheba laid at the feet of Solomon.

CURE SICK HEADACHE.

Spirit Willing, Nostrils Weak.

If one could reconcile the nostrils to the situation, the eye would delight in the profuse diversity of form and color while laden camels, donkeys and oxen wend their way through the tortuous labyrinths followed by bowing drivers who seem always on the move, except when the Mussulman calls to prayer from the ubiquitous minaret. Then every face turns to Mecca, every head bows in worship, and ever heart pours out its longings regardless of the inquisitive stare or scoffing remark of the passing foreigner. During this period a solemn hush falls upon these busy haarts, to give place ten minutes later to renewed and more vigorous efforts to drown rival voices. The merchants in the native shops, which are from eight to fifteen feet square, are surrounded by workmen engaged in manufacturing the articles exposed for sale. Each merchant confines his business to a particular article or articles of a particular line, such as jewellery, glassware, shoes, silks, etc., and strives to arrive as near perfection in workmanship as possible in his own specialty. The result is of course, a much-greater variety of design, the development of more individuality and skill than is to be found under the English or American "trust" system.

The Khedive's Palaces.

The middle and laboring class Egyptian appears to be a kind, courteous, intelligent fellow, who says he appreciates the freedom and liberty he enjoys under British rule. Notwithstanding the fact of the climate being so warm, he seems to delight in pay drill-same all classes of Egyptians seem to be great workers, the amusements being left to the foreign element.

Like Freedom, Dislike Liberators.

After I had been in the country several months and had become acquainted with some of the native gentry, I was surprised to learn that while one and all admitted the many benefits of British rule, there was a strong undercurrent against the English, the reasons for which I shall reserve for a future letter.

While Egypt affords exceptional advantages as to health, comfort, sport and education it is not a country for a person of moderate means. It is a country where European necessities are very expensive, while the natives are able to live comfortably on half what it would cost in America. The magnificent hotels are only open five months in the year, and must therefore charge high prices to enable them to pay dividends on the great capital invested. The cost of railway travel is about the same as in France, or about twice as expensive as in Canada, though the service, meals, sleepers, etc., are much more comfortable than in either of those countries. Cairo is perhaps as expensive a city to visit as Monte Carlo yet the fashion, beauty and wealth of Europe, Asia and America congregate here, and certainly every luxury, comfort and amusement is provided for those clever people whose business it is to separate the wealthy foreigner from his money.

In Egypt one never hears the remark, "It is a fine day," for the reason that every day is fine and no one need take the subject into consideration when arranging a trip to one or other of the many beautiful environs. The Great Pyramid is but nine miles distant, reached after traversing a splendid boulevard the entire distance, with the green banks on the Nile on the east, and fields filled with flowers on the opposite side. Arriving at the Pyramids is found a grand hotel, where the smart set meet daily and at afternoon tea arrange programs for the various entertainments when they will meet later in the evening.

The Month of August.

There is no month in the whole year when nature wears a more beautiful appearance than in the month of August. Spring has many beauties, and May is a favorite month with many, but the charms of this time of year are enhanced by their contrast with the winter months, and thus gain such advantage. It comes when we remember nothing but clear skies, green fields, and warm sunshine, and when the recollection of snow and ice and bleak winds has faded from our minds as completely as though it never appeared from the earth—and yet what a pleasant time it is! Orchards are overloaded with the bum of bees; trees bend beneath the thick clusters of rich fruit, which how they branches to the ground; and the corn, piled in graceful sheaves or waving in every light breath that sweeps about it, as if it would the sickle, tempts the landscape with a golden hue. A mellow haziness seems to hang over the whole earth; the influence of the season seems to extend itself to the very wagon, whose slow motion across the well-reaped field is perceptible only to the eye, but strikes with no harsh sound upon the ear.—From the "Pickwick Papers."

A Relic of the Civil War.

A cannon ball, which had lain buried since 1634, was recently recovered from a field on the farm of Mr. Hampson, of Acton, Nantwich, Cheshire. The town of Nantwich played a considerable part in the war as the headquarters of the forces of Generals Fairfax and Brereton. Much fighting took place at Acton, where, during a portion of the siege of Nantwich, the Royalist forces were located. On some of the masonry of Acton and Nantwich churches the effects of shot are still visible the marks caused by cannon shot.

The Siren of La Presna.

La Presna is the greatest and most influential paper in South America. Its offices are in Buenos Ayres, Argentina, situated in a magnificent building in the Avenida. This building is said to be one of the most imposing in the world. It has a tower crowned by a great golden statue of a young woman representing the Spirit of La Presna. The proudest possession of La Presna is a 5,000 horsepower steam operated siren. Whenever there is any startling disaster—the death of a crowned head or other event of worldwide interest—whoop goes La Presna's siren and is heard for a wide thousands of the city. The local government excels a fine for this performance, $100 per minute, with a minimum of $200, and if the blast is kept up for the all the people in double, so when one man is sent to operate the screecher another is sent running with a two hundred dollar bill to the courts. The next operation is to drape the above referred to young woman's torch with red velvet in case of a catastrophe; with crape in the event of a death. All this causes the most extraordinary sensation.

A Real Celebrity.

The local pride of the natives of Cape Elizabeth, Me., is so intense that it takes the attitude of pity for all who have the misfortune to dwell elsewhere. This, says a writer in the Lewiston Journal, is known to regular summer visitors, and by most of them is considered quite amusing. Then comes a new comer, who had joined the gathering in the store, composed of fishermen and summer visitors, ventured to observe that some of the distinguished men who had come from Maine.

"There's Longfellow," he said, "and Hannibal Hamlin, and James G. Blaine, William Pitt Fessenden, Thomas B. Reed and"—

Here an old fisherman looked up from whetting his jackknife blades, and broke in. "Smart? Those fellows smart?" he questioned. "You just come down an' see Josh Pillsbury skin fish!"

SELECT YOUR MEDICINE WITH CARE.

In debility and weakness medicine should be mild and far reaching. Many Pills and purgatives are too harsh. They are drastic instead of curative. Excessive action is always followed by reaction and knowing this, Dr. Hamilton devised his pills of Mandrake and Butternut so as to mildly increase liver and kidney activity, flush out the alimentary canal, tone and regulate the bowels. Thus do Dr. Hamilton's Pills eliminate poisons from the body, restore evenness to the skin, bring strength and the sweet restorer of health—sleep. Best medicine on earth, 25c per box at all dealers.

Shooting From an Elephant.

The elephant's howdah is that bed of Procrustes, in which one can neither sit nor stand with any approach to reasonable ease, and in which a recumbent attitude is impossible, says Blackwood's Magazine. Its advantages are, first, that standing in it a man can shoot on every side of him; second, that it is convenient for the carriage of the sportsman's paraphernalia—his guns on racks on either side, his ammunition in a trough in front, his other requisites in leather pockets here and there on the sides of the machine and his bed blanket on the seat—and, third, that in a hinder compartment an attendant can stand to hold that monstrous umbrella over his head, or when quick loading is required take from his hand the gun just fired and recharge it. These are the advantages. Otherwise the howdah is an abomination.

Most Famous Saying.

"What is the most famous saying ever made by man?" an editor asked.

"Why, that Caesar, some thought that Socrates, some that Lincoln, some that Nelson, had said the most memorable thing; but finally the palm was awarded to Euclid, the mathematician.

Euclid went to Alexandria to teach Ptolemy Soter, the king of Egypt, mathematics. Ptolemy plodded at his problems a week or two, and then asked Euclid impatiently if there was not some more special, shorter way by which he could be taught.

"Sire," Euclid answered, "there is no royal road to learning."

A. M. and P. M.

Here is an excellent catch: Ingenuously ask any friend or acquaintance the meaning of a. m. and p. m. You will receive some such answer as "Why, morning and afternoon," or "Before dinner and after dinner," or "Up to 12 o'clock high noon and after 12 high noon," or "From midnight to noon and from noon to midnight," or "Ante meridian and post meridian; before and after noon." It is a conservative wager that every one to whom the question is put will stake his happiness on the word meridian, while the correct word is meridiem. Ante meridiem and post meridiem are abbreviated to a. m. and p. m.

Not a Clothes Peg.

Peggie Newton had been a faithful household drudge for years, and had not grumbled much when her wages were occasionally passed over. But as time went on, and her salary fell more and more into arrear, she ventured to ask for something "on account."

"Why, haven't I paid you your wages nicely, Peg? How careless of me," her mistress said. "I'm sorry I have no money in the house just now, but here's a smart cloak that I've ceased to wear, and which is only a wee bit out o' fashion. You'll take it in lieu of wages, won't you?"

"No, ma'am, I'm sure I shan't," said Peg, wrathfully eying the faded old cloak. "A peg I may be by name, but I won't be the sort of peg that people hang castoff clothes on—not if I know it."—London Answers.

Great Things From Little Causes Grow.—It takes very little to derange the stomach. The cause may be slight, a cold, something eaten that's shark, anxiety, worry, or some other single cause. But if precautions be not taken, this simple cause may have most serious consequences. Many a chronically debilitated constitution today owes its destruction to simple causes. Shield your stomach. Keep the digestive apparatus in healthy condition, and all will be well. Parmelee's Vegetable Pills are better than any other laxative.

A certain man was recently very sad because his wife had gone out of town on a visit, which visit would not shorten in spite of his appeals to her to come home. He finally hit upon a plan to induce her to return. He sent her a copy of each of the local papers with one item clipped out, and when she wrote to find out what was the matter he replied that he refused to tell her. The scheme worked admirably. In less than a week she was home to find out what it was that had made her husband feel so badly about her husband didn't want her to know about!

Every man has his faults, but no man has as many as his wife thinks he has.

"Dear," said the physician's wife, "when can you let me have $10?"

"Well," replied the medical man, "I hope to cash a draft shortly."

"Cash a draft! What draft?"

"The one I saw old Mr. Jenkins sitting in this morning."

WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"I wonder," said the man who was given to laugh at times, "I wonder what is meant by the embarrassment of riches?" "I suppose relations, very likely," replied the man who was one.

A Pleasant Medicine. — There are some pills which have no other purpose evidently than to beget painful internal disturbances in the patient, adding to his troubles and perplexities rather than diminishing them. One might as well swallow some corrosive substance. Parmelee's Vegetable Pills have not this disagreeable and injurious property. They are easy to take, and not unpleasant to the taste, and their action is mild and soothing. A trial of them will prove this. They offer peace to the dyspeptic.

HARMFUL STOMACH DOSING.

NO NEED OF IT WHEN HYOMEI IS USED TO CURE CATARRH.

Physicians and scientists agree that the less medicine one swallows, the better. It is in accepting with this idea that Hyomei is recommended by leading physicians throughout this and other catarrhal sections.

When the treatment is used in catarrhal troubles, there is no stomach dosing, for the medicine is taken in the air you breathe. Breathed through the mouth it goes right to the spot where the catarrhal germs are present. It heals the inflamed and irritated mucous membrane, killing the disease germs and enriching the blood with the oxygen, driving all catarrhal poisons from the system.

Do not try to cure catarrh of the head by eating medicine. Your stomach has its function to perform, and cannot do the work of the throat and lungs. Hyomei is a scientific treatment, and is the only catarrh remedy that cures. Hyomei gives relief in ten minutes, and will positively cure in a few days you will be entirely cured. It is recommended and will result in a complete and lasting cure. The outfit costs but $1.00, extra bottles, if needed, 50 cents. We do not want anyone's money unless Hyomei gives relief and cures, and we absolutely agree that money will be refunded unless the cure is perfectly satisfactory.

All druggists should be able to supply you with Hyomei or we will send it by mail on receipt of price, and every druggist is loyal with the understanding that it costs nothing unless it cures. Why suffer to-day for a symptom dark, which we will send you free, together with treatise on Catarrh and how to cure it, when you call at your druggist's and get Hyomei in full strength, and if you do not find it as represented, return it and get your money back. Don't you know that little boys who fish on the Sabbath go to the bad place?"

The Best Flour, Dafoe's Nonesuch, Dafoe's Manitoba Patent

By numerous tests by the best bakers the above mentioned grades have been proven to be the best flour in the market.

When buying flour, ask for Dafoe's, and patronize your home mill, thereby producing fresher and finer flour, more economical and cheaper than the product of the Western mills, which has to be transported thousands of miles, at great expense and waste, to you. It also teaches you, of inferior quality.

The grocer complains if the farmer or the miller sends Dafoe, Toronto or to outside points for an article he could get at the home store just as good, but he does not hesitate to buy flour from a mills hundreds of miles away and sell you an inferior flour for more money than he can purchase the home product for, every bag of which is guaranteed.

Choice corn meal and buckwheat flour always on hand. Feed grinding a specialty, with the best feed mills known to the trade.

Goethe's Last Moments.

The story of the deathbed of Goethe reveals a striking picture of fortitude, artistic calm and intellectual activity under the chilling dews of death. The information is gathered from a letter written on March 22, 1832, the day after Goethe's death, by Fraulein Louise Seidler, an art student and close friend of the poet's family. On the evening before his dissolution, with a lucidness taking possession of him and the death rattle beginning to be audible, Goethe, with his charming daughter-in-law by his side, wrote down of nothing but his pet theory of color, of the treaty of Basle, of his desire that the children should go to the theatre. As sleep did not come with the night, he called for a newly published volume of history, and covered his head to read it with a joke. Even at 4 o'clock the next morning, just three and a half hours before he died, he sent for a portfolio to talk optics and was setting himself to classify some papers when the last agony seized him. He then lay motionless, notwithstanding its violence, till respiration ceased and the heart stood still.—London Globe.

How to Handle Your Horse.

Decision should never in handling horses be confounded with unwise determination to have things your way. In this application it means the faculty of doing the right thing at the right instant and not be cultivated by frequent practice with all sorts of horses, and of course no hands were ever developed by handling any one animal for a long time. It is decision that gives the hand the moment the horse yields; that uses the roughest methods at a pinch, for handling it by no means always delicate of touch; that frustrates the most determined attempts of kicker, rearer or bolter; that picks the vital point to subdue the animal carry himself to the 'best advantage for the purpose of the moment. Decision is the very close to intuitive in effect. Decision dominates the situation at many critical moments, and the horse is quick to discern and to presume upon its absence. There is no such thing as a safe partnership with a horse. You must be the master or he will be, to your certain future discomfiture.—F. M. Ware in Outing Magazine.

Big Benefits at London Theaters.

Betterton, in 1709, when his salary was £4 a week, had a benefit and received £130 as his share of the receipts and £450 in the shape of donations. The biggest benefit performances of modern times have taken place at Drury Lane. That for Ben Webster, held in March, 1874, realized £2,000; the profit on the Buckstone celebration, in June, 1876, was £1,200; for the Neville Farren benefit the same year, in March, 1898, there was obtained £7,200, though half of this amount was secured from private donations, which flowed in when it was known that the Messrs. Rothschild had volunteered to invest what sum was realized, give the regular comedienne an annuity and, on her death, grant the theatrical charities half of the capital.—London Chronicle.

To Insure Privacy of Mail.

All private and confidential correspondence according to postoffice inspector, should either be sealed with wax or else addressed and stamped on the back instead of the front. Sealing with wax is an excellent insurance of privacy, but it is a difficult and awkward operation, and wax and a match, candle and seal are not always at hand. The other method is much the better. After fastening down the flap of the envelope firmly, affix the stamp across the flap's junction and write the address across it as well. Then it is absolutely impossible to steam open the letter and close it again in such a way as to escape detection.

The Creeks.

A pure creole is a person born in Louisiana of French or Spanish parents. It is a mistaken idea to suppose that a creole has negro blood in his veins. A creole negro is one whose forefathers were owned by the early French and Spanish settlers and who speaks a corruption of those languages known as "gumbo." Their descendants are the creole negroes and should never be confiented with creoles in the true sense of the term.

Why, Indeed!

At an examination of Sunday school children the following was one of the questions put upon the blackboard: "Do you like to hear it? If not, take Scott's Emulsion. "Twill fill out your puckery yaps, bolster cheeks, and tint pencils. Why not have a plump figure? Don't let disease steal a march on you. 44b

A DEADLY DECLINE

SAVED JUST IN TIME BY DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS.

Before many days the Lenox began taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills she looked more like a corpse than a live girl," says Mrs. Geo. A. Myers, of South Brodalee, Ont. "Her blood seemed as though it had all turned to water. She grew very thin, had no appetite, and what little food she did eat gave her no strength at all. She was treated by one of the best physicians in this part of the country, but she was daily growing worse and her friends gave up all hope of her ever being well again. Then a neighbor advised Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. After taking a couple of boxes she began to show signs of improvement. Her color began to return to her cheeks, she gained on the scales, right on gaining and after taking eight boxes of the pills she was restored to good health. She is now fifteen years old, and many friends of this girl's family ascribe her present health and excellent appearance to the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Before using the pills she was a mere skeleton, and her friends feared she would not live long. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills actually make new blood, in that way they cure when all else fails. They cure all common diseases like anaemia, headache, backache, indigestion, dizziness, nervousness, neuralgia, rheumatism and the after ailments and irregularities of girls and women. Sold by all dealers in medicine or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

SMALL MAN VS. LARGE.

The "small" merchant, and the "small man" generally, is feeling the keen competition of the larger institution. In no phase of the world's history is the "survival of the fittest" exemplification is the basis of a story in the Metropolitan Magazine, entitled "The Last Town of the Sorrows." The story tells how the small man is fighting for existence against a huge concern which opens up in his town, and how the estate groceries, having factories and warehouses of their own, is a dramatic picture, with a moral which is worth pondering over. The November number is full of good things including illustrated articles on Athens "Ancient and Modern," on Fort Ticonderoga—the sort of Western Canada; on the opening of the first railway between Toronto and Montreal; and a splendidly illustrated story for children entitled "A Visit to Flameland." The Canadian Magazine is showing steady progress in all its features.

Robinson Crusoe.

The second volume of "Robinson Crusoe," by Daniel De Foe, published on Aug. 20, 1719, was the first story published in English with illustrations. The illustrations consisted of a map of the world, in which the different voyages of the hero of the tale were delineated. The first volume of "Robinson Crusoe" was published in April 1719, and became popular at once.

second edition was printed seventeen days after the first, twenty-five days later another followed, and a fourth was published on Aug. 8 of the same year. On Aug. 20 the second volume was issued under the title of "The Further Adventures of Robinson Crusoe; being the second and last part of his life and of the strange surprizing account of his travels round three parts of the globe. Written by himself. To which is added a map of the world, in which is delineated the voyage of Robinson Crusoe."

A Curiosity In Figures.

The following remarkable contribution to the curiosities of figures consists of two series of numbers, of which no description is necessary, as they speak for themselves. Perhaps there is no special profit in them, but they are worth preserving nevertheless:

1 times 9 plus 2 equals 11.
12 times 9 plus 3 equals 111.
123 times 9 plus 4 equals 1111.
1234 times 9 plus 5 equals 11111.
12345 times 9 plus 6 equals 111111.
123456 times 9 plus 7 equals 1111111.
1234567 times 9 plus 8 equals 11111111.
12345678 times 9 plus 9 equals 111111111.
1 times 8 plus 1 equals 9.
12 times 8 plus 2 equals 98.
123 times 8 plus 3 equals 987.
1234 times 8 plus 4 equals 9876.
12345 times 8 plus 5 equals 98765.
123456 times 8 plus 6 equals 987654.
1234567 times 8 plus 7 equals 9876543.
12345678 times 8 plus 8 equals 98765431.

White Animals Can't Smell.

"Pure white animals," said a pet stock dealer, "have no sense of smell. Hence they are continually eating things that disagree with them, and in eight cases out of ten poison themselves and die. Pure white pigs should never be allowed to run loose in the fields and woods. For, without the protection of a sense of smell, such pigs, when they get out, eat all sorts of poisonous roots and berries and die off rapidly. "In Africa the white rhinoceros poisons itself by eating the euphorbia, and pure white sheep are difficult to rear because they are continually munching shrubs and grasses that don't agree with them."

A dose of Miller's Worm Powders occasionally will keep the children healthy. For sale at all druggists. 34cb.—Fred. L. Hooper.

ARCHIBALD HAROLD DARLINGTON.
Death has again entered the home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Darlington, Strathcona, and taken away their son Archie, after an illness of four weeks. Deceased contracted typhoid fever in Watertown and came home. All that medical aid and careful nursing could do was done, but he never rallied, and on Monday, 22d Oct., he passed away, at the early age of nineteen years. Much sympathy is extended to the bereaved parents and brothers and sisters in their double bereavement, as only seven months ago they laid a daughter to rest.

Only One Drug Store.

If you knew or felt sure that you could go to a Drug Store and get the very best drugs, or the very best toilet brush, hair brush or hot water bottle, etc., and that your prescription would be just as carefully compounded as it could possibly be by competent druggists, and that you would be just as cheerfully served and as courteously treated when making a two cent purchase as when making a two dollar one, would you not always deal at that store? Would there not be only one drug store as far as you would be concerned? Wallace's Red Cross Drug Store "IS THAT STORE".

A STOVE TALK.

The stove season is nearly here again, and you are already beginning to plan for that new and up to date range. Thinking of the comforts which it will bring to you. "THE WAYWARD SON".
Manager Brisco announces that the offering at the Opera House here next Saturday night, 10th Nov., will be the sensational comedy drama entitled "The Wayward Son." The play is the work of Mr. Neil Twomey, an hor of "When the Harvest Days are over" and the Postmaster's Daughter. A carefully selected cast of players has been selected to interpret each part. The Wayward Son is free from all stereotyped melodramas that are fast driving the up-to-date theatre patron. Its pathos is not intense enough to produce tears, nor climaxes blood curdling, but it contains enough heart interest and natural thrills to keep the audience aware of the fact that he is witnessing a play of more than ordinary merit and one that will linger in his memory in contrasting it with the rapid fire sensationalism of the melodramas now flooding the country at cheap prices. The Wayward Son comes to the Opera House next Saturday, 10th Nov.

McKIM—WILSON.
At 1 p.m., Tuesday, Oct. 30th, a quiet wedding was celebrated in the Wesley Methodist church, Toronto, by Rev. C. O. Johnston, when Miss Georgia E. Wilson, formerly of Stayner, was married to Dr. Herbert A. McKim, of Port Bowen, Ont. The bride entered the church leaning on the arm of her brother, Mr. A. McGowan, and was becomingly dressed in white silk voilestone trimmed with Chaney lace and liberty satin ribbon. She wore a tulle veil with orange blossoms, and carried a shower bouquet of brides roses. The bridesmaid was Miss E. Pearl Wilson, sister of the bride, and Miss Francis Mackenzie acted as brother of the groom. They were dainty gowns of cream crepe de chene with hat to match, and carried pink carnations. The groom was supported by Mr. W. McKitchnie, of Brighton, Ont. Dr. and Mrs. McKim left on the 4.30 train for their home in Port Bowen.

IN TIME OF PEACE.
In the first months of the Russian-Japanese war we had a Sir Alexander of the necessity for preparation and the early advocates of peace who, so to speak, "have dangled their boots in the dry water." The value of preparation has made history and given to us our greatest men. The individual as well as the nation should be prepared for any emergency. Are you prepared to successfully combat the first cold you take? A cold can be cured much more quickly when treated as soon as it has been contracted, and before it has become settled in the system. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is famous for its cures of colds and it should be kept at hand ready for instant use. For sale at The Red Cross Drug Store.

HARRY A. DALY.

DEATH'S HARVEST.

Saturday and Sunday last brought sad news to two homes in Napanee, and shocked a host of relatives and friends. It was the announcement of the sudden death of Mrs. Lawrence Fowler, Scranton, Pa., and Mr. Harry Daly, at Toronto.

MRS. FOWLER

was George Hellen Herring, youngest daughter of the late George Herring, and was united to Mr. Lawrence Fowler four years ago in October, and as a bride she left for her new home amidst all the joy and happiness of such partings. The remains were brought to Napanee on Monday evening, and at 2 o'clock next day the funeral service was held in St. Mary Magdalene church, the beautiful edifice being filled by friends desirous of paying a last tribute to one beloved in life.

Deceased died very suddenly after giving birth to a child, and her devoted husband was at her bedside, but neither she physician, or her husband, had the slightest hint that such a serious complication had set in, and the angel came and took her home. Mrs. Fowler was one of our most popular young ladies while a resident of Napanee, and was possessed of a bright and lovely disposition, which endeared her to all. Besides her husband she leaves a mother, she one of two daughters, the eldest scarcely two years old, and three sisters, Mrs. Wm. Mrs. J. W. Robinson and Miss Fred Herring, and a half sister, Miss Freda Holmes, also, a brother, Mr. Hole Herring, and half brother, Alfred Holmes.

The remains were brought to Napanee on Monday evening, Mrs. Holmes, Mr. Fowler and his brother-in-law, Mr. E. Dymond, accompanying them. In her new home, the brightness of her disposition and unselfish nature made it an ideal one, and she was beloved by all who came under her gentle influence. The handsome casket was covered with beautiful cut flowers, flowers from friends far and near, the tributes were laid in the family plot in the Eastern cemetery. Chapl. Hellen, Holmes and family have the sympathy of their many friends.

HENRY ALDWORTH DALY.

eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Daly, died very suddenly at Toronto last Sunday morning. Deceased was a graduate in Arts at Toronto University, and was taking his third year in Law. He had been apparently in good health, and on Saturday evening attended a banquet and debate at the home of a friend. He was also seen on the street marching at about address, when it was observed that he was acting strangely. He was taken out into the fresh air, but this did not improve his condition, and at 10 o'clock a doctor was called, who said he was suffering from hysteria, and expressed the opinion that he would be all right in an hour. At 2 o'clock his condition had grown worse, and another doctor was called in who said the hysteria was probably brought on by the excitement attending the banquet. Shortly after, exceptionally fine young man, gifted and studious, he had a rare grasp of subjects, which he used to good advantage, and apparently endless energy. He was a favorite among whom he was very popular. Was a son of Mr. and Mrs. Daly, and had occupied other offices in the Town Hall, Napanee, previous to his departure for Toronto. His popularity was shown by the wonderful concourse of people who came to pay their respects, and by the floral tributes sent by the students of Varsity, various young people's societies, and friends. The funeral took place from the home of his parents, Arthur, Donald and Daly, sister, in Napanee.

Mr. and Mrs. Daly and family have the sympathy of the whole community in their severe affliction.

MRS. Z. A. VANLUVEN.

On Tuesday morning, 6th Nov., at 7.40 o'clock, Miss Almeda J. wife of Mr. Zara A. VanLuven, of Napanee, entered into her heavenly rest, after a lingering illness of nearly a few days. Mrs. VanLuven was the eldest of twelve children of Mr. and Mrs. Jacob and Jane A. Clancy, of Albion, Mich., but during the last nineteen years resided in Michigan.

In the fall of 1906 she made a visit to her family in fifty years. On Sept. 1906, she was married to Mr. VanLuven 17th of the same month. Of a kind and sociable, was of a sunny disposition, always looking on the bright side of life. She was true and faithful to her friends, and a generous and sympathetic helper of the poor and unfortunate. She was a consistent member of the Methodist church when a girl, and remained a consistent member of this fellowship to the day of her death.

These brothers and two sisters attended on Wednesday in Napanee from their respective homes, to be in attendance at the funeral, viz., Rev. J. Frank Clancy, Dr. Marshall G. Clancy, Mrs. Dr. Freund, Chicago, Ill., Miss Alpha Clancy, Albion, Mich., and Rev. Judson Clancy, Portland, Ore.

Service was held at her late home on Thursday, at 2 o'clock, by her pastor, Rev. W. H. Brusley, conducting the services and speaking in the highest terms of deceased, after which the remains were viewed by the members of the Family Circle, of which deceased was an active member, and who attended in a body. The body was then taken to its last resting place at Muscow.

KING BRUCE AND THE SPIDER.

The event in the King of Scotland's life has been made familiar to the generations as one presenting hope in the midst of despair. Don't be discouraged because your experience with opticians and glasses seemed, has not been satisfactory. Test the ability of the expert optician in charge of the new optical department at The Medical Hall, and if you are not perfectly fitted it will cost you nothing. Fred L. Hooper.

NEWBURGH.

The Public Library concert given in Public's Hall, on Friday evening last, was the big success of the season. Public's Hall was packed to the standing, and eighty-seven seats were reserved and the plan was sold out by 7.30. The "goods" were enough to make the largest crowd in years was present when D. A. Nesbit, B.A., the chairman, opened the programme with a brief speech. There were two farces "Out on Bail," and "My Lord in Livery," both of which scored. Decided hits and kept the vast audience in roars of laughter from start to finish. Harold Ryan as Sam Savory, Mr. Lord in Livery, Jim out of Work," and as Spargrit, the family butler, in "My Lord in Livery," was the star of the evening, and he was ably supported by the remainder of the company. Miss Gertie's solo, "When I am dead and in my new home," by Miss Lena Lavery, was a big hit, and the applause which followed fairly shook the rafters. The music between the acts was excellent. Miss Bessie Mason opened with "Men of Herlick," and two quartettes by Misses Wood and Wilson and Messrs. Moore and Yeomans. F. D. Moore, our popular tenor soloist, was next. He sang "The Death of Nelson" in fine voice and the storm of applause he received at the close of the song was an effective rendering of that difficult piece. He responded to an encore. The proceeds were $105, and Friday will net $125.00 as a result of the concert.

Mrs. Benjamin and Mrs. Oldham, of Yarker, came down for the concert on Friday, and were the guests of Mrs. M. Ryan.

Mr. Homer Judge Madden held Division Court here on Friday. There was a very large docket.

D. H. Preston, K.C., and W. G. Wilson, Napanee, were in town on Friday attending court.

Rev. John S. Ainsworth, Minister of Justice, Ottawa, spent Friday with his father, Rev. D. D. Ainsworth.

Quarterly meeting held in the Methodist church on Sunday morning, and Sacrament administered by Rev. Mr. Thomson, of Tamworth, assisted by Rev. Mr. Ainsworth.

Miss Minnie Nesbit, Westplain, spent Sunday at her home here.

Mrs. C. Moore spent a few days last week at L. M. Derrotell's, Napanee.

Hallowe'en passed off very quietly. No serious damage was done.

Mrs. Bowman and Miss Maude Heaman, Kemptville, arrived on Thursday of last week to spend the winter here.

Mrs. J. Belcher, Napanee, was here in his automobile on Sunday, and spent the afternoon at Mrs. A. Maddock's.

Miss L. A. Parks, Enterprise, spent Friday and Saturday at J. J. Shorey's.

Mr. Lang, Petertoro', spent a few days last week with George Walker's.

A number of young people engaged Farley Hall's rink for the concert on Friday evening, and tripped the light fantastic toe till the wee morning.

The Misses Vanalstine, Napanee, spent a few days with sister, Mrs. Wm. Boyce.

The many friends of Dr. H. A. McKim will extend their congratulations on his recent election to Parliament. Herb is another of our Newburgh boys who has started out successfully in business, and we are indeed pleased to hear of it.

Robert Jones is recovering from an attack of appendicitis.

Mr. Hall, of Napanee, was in town last week in the interests of the I. O. F., soliciting several applications.

The regular Literary meeting of the Epworth League was held on the abatement of the Methodist church next Monday evening. The subject for the evening will be a debate, resolved "That a United Newburgh is preferable to a Republican." Ray Farley will lead the affirmative and Percy Nesbit the negative. Good music will be provided and all are cordially invited to attend this Literary of the League.

Mrs. Bertelet, Odessa, was in town this week.

Mrs. Wm. Lewis and Master John Oldham, Yarker, were in the village on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Hutchinson has sold his two houses now occupied by F. D. Moore and Toronto.

John Farley is on an extended visit to his brother, Ray Farley, Napanee and Toronto.

The Literary society in the High School was organized this week. The following officers were elected:

President—Bernard McCaul.
Vice-President—Gertie Nesbit.
Secretary—Miss Olive Galbraith.
Executive Committee—Miss Reid and Alets Scriver.

We extend Miss Limbert has been engaged as organist in the Methodist church, vice Miss Ethel M. Hartley, resigned.

Rev. Aylesworth is in Centreville to-day. Thursday, taking Rector Cook's place as Clerk of the Division Court.

C. H. Firkle shipped a carload of cucumbers to Montreal on Tuesday.

It is estimated there were 350 people in Public's Hall on Friday evening, probably the largest crowd ever in the village on a similar occasion.

Harry Beeman resumed his studies at the Napanee Collegiate Institute on Monday.

The concert number is certainly in full swing and the class of entertainments is fully up to the standard of former years. The Ladies' Aid of the Methodist church presented Geo. B. Cummings, Tenor, and Miss Grace Freeman, Reader, Belleville, to give a concert in the Methodist church on Nov. 19th. Both are strangers to Newburgh, but their singing is highly commended by the press, and an interesting evening is in store for those who come. The tickets are 25 cents each.

FLOWERS ON SATURDAY MORNING

As the weather is now cooler we have made arrangements for our first shipment of flowers for stock to arrive on Saturday morning. Chrysanthemums, Carnations, etc., can be had fresh from the Dale Estate greenhouses. The Medical Hall—Fred L. Hooper, sole agent for Napanee.

Give Fair Play to

A really reliable remedy for headache—Zutoo.

If you have got it into your head that Zutoo Tablets will hurt you, you are mistaken.

It isn't fair to us for you to judge Zutoo by the drug cures.

If you find it does not cure your headache, sick, nervous or other use, in twenty minutes, and leave you feeling good every time—no bad after effects, then discard it.

But do not condemn it unfairly without a trial, and keep on suffering from headaches. You really do not have to, and one trial of Zutoo will prove it.

All we ask for Zutoo is fair play—that you give it a trial before concluding as to its merits or demerits.

Wont you do this? You'll be glad ever after if you do.

We'll send trial tablets for nothing, or you can buy them at dealers in 10c. and 25c. packages.

A HANDY HOMES BOOK.

A book with the above title has just been issued by the Family Herald and Weekly Star, of Montreal. It certainly is a well compiled and cook book all round, family doctor and cook book all in one. It contains 700 household recipes for things every one knows how to make, and yet few people do know. It will solve the question on any subject. It was a new writer's idea, and a good one, for the publishers always wants to prepare book inside. It must be cheap, and it must be right. This work it really is. The Family Herald and Weekly Star will send a copy to any subscriber free, and every person should write for one. The Family Herald and Weekly Star certainly gives a big dollar's worth in a year.

THE BONNIE BRIER BUSH.

One of the best companies that has visited Napanee is coming, that is Hugh Chisholm's Bonnie Brier Bush Co., which held the boards at the Brant House during last Friday night. Brantford is a good city for everything. The house was full to overflowing, which shows that Napanee can appreciate a good clean show, and are willing to pay for it. The characters were all good, David Dayoes, as Lachlan Campbell, was fine. D. Bloom, as Hendrick Camiels Reynolds, Flora Campbell, Helen Warren, as Annie, and Georg. O'Meara, as Kate Carney's, leaving little wanting as ideal characters in this popular play.

A NOTABLE EVENT.

For some time past the Oddfellows of this town have been endeavoring to secure a strong high-class attraction which would prove something new and novel in the way of an entertainment to be given under their auspices in the near future. With this in view they at last succeeded in securing Newton Beers, the well known dramatic impersonator, in his highly interesting characterization of the dramatic version of the popular dramatic divertisement entitled "David and Jonathan," which will be produced by Argyle Lodge No. 212, I.O.O.F., in the Opera House on Wednesday, November 21st. House on sale Monday morning and ample preparation will be made to make the affair a notable event. Mr. Beers has been so long before the public in Shakespearian and other roles that he needs but little introduction to the amusement loving public. He comes direct from Boston agreements to his appearance in this town. Mr. Beers deserves, and no doubt will be greeted by a large and enthusiastic at 8 p.m.

DAVID BRECKENRIDGE.

We are again called upon to chronicle the death of one of the most widely known and respected men in this county in the person of Mr. David Breckenridge, which died at his residence on the North Frederickborough, on Friday, the 26th inst., after an illness of about three weeks of typhoid fever. Although everything that could be done for him by loving hands was done, he succumbed to the dreaded disease, and his end was wide and favorably known throughout the district, and his death will cause a painful sensation among his numerous friends and acquaintances. He was about 50 years of age.

The kindly disposition which endeared to him a large circle of friends, and his unassuming, as a neighbor, ever ready to help by a word or deed, or be truly one to be a neighbor's friend that ever was a citizen of this vicinity, and although he took no prominent part in politics he was always ready to give his estimate of the situation. David was a strong adherent of the Presbyterian church. The Rev. Mr. Dunn held the funeral services at his home, after which his remains were taken, followed by a large concourse of friends, to the Western cemetery vault and interred there to await the final resurrection morn. The family plot there, he has been so long before the public in connection with the Methodist church, on Sunday, owing to the absence of the pastor, Rev. Twenty Minutes Time Enough?

To Cure the Worst Headache From Any Cause—New Reduction Method.

Most headaches and pains yield instantly to the new Reduction Method—Dr. Shoop's Twenty Minute Headache Cure. The cause for these pains is congestion—a rushing of blood to the nerve centers—which distends the veins to nearly the bursting point. Swollen and congested, these veins and capillaries exert an irritating pressure on the myriads of nerve branches and fibres. Then, there's pain, and finally that excruciating, cease-less ache. This new Reduction Method disperses the blood, overflow, and directs it to the proper channels. It frees the nerve centers from all irritation—the pains and aches vanish. Because their cause has been removed. You may try a thousand and one so-called remedies—you may dope and stupefy the nerves into submission—but the torment will return. Only which brings prompt relief and which at the same time makes it more powerful and more dangerous to disease. Dr. Shoop's Restorative is the most scientific remedy that will be offered to the public during the entire duration of the present century. Its discovery marks a new era in the treatment of pain. Its action Method of Medicine has thus founded a way—simple and sure, yet the only way to thoroughly overcome these attacks of Headache and Neuralgia. The effect of Dr. Shoop's Twenty Minute Headache Cure is prompt—perfect—is suited to all forms of Headache and absolutely positive in every temperament. For sale and recommended by

The Bridal Eve

The Duke of Bereseligh handed Lady Etheridge out and hurried her at once into the best parlor, where he placed her in charge of the landlady. The duke then repaired to another room, where the magistrate was sitting, and where the cabman was already brought before him to give in his testimony. The man could only repeat what he had already told the duke, and so, when his words had been duly taken down in writing, he was set at liberty.

Meanwhile, Lady Etheridge having partaken of a slight repast and reposed herself upon a sofa for half an hour, arose and gave audience to the Duke of Bereseligh and the magistrate, who waited on her there, to receive her statement.

When she had circumstantially detailed all that had happened to her, the magistrate expressed his astonishment at events so much more complicated than had been suspected.

That the pretended deliverers were in league with the first assailants could not be doubted. But what the motive of the masked man could have been in carrying her off from the house in the wood could not be surmised.

The magistrate, having collected all the evidence possible from all the parties, took leave and withdrew.

Post horses were ordered, and Lady Etheridge, accompanied by the Duke of Bereseligh, and attended by her servant, started for London.

They reached Bereseligh House at nightfall.

Lady Etheridge at once retired to bed to seek the uninterrupted rest she so much required. And the duke retired to his mother all the particulars of the abduction and the rescue.

Feeling sure that Rose would require repose for many days, the duchess ad dressed a respectful letter to the queen, explaining the cause that he evitably delayed the honor Lady Etheridge desired of immediately waiting upon her majesty.

CHAPTER XXI.

Lady Etheridge remained quietly at home for a few days, neither making nor receiving visits.

Since the night of the abduction and rescue, no further intelligence had been gained of the perpetrators of the violence.

The Duke of Bereseligh's manner to Lady Etheridge was now so full of reverential tenderness that her ladyship was not surprised, when he met her in a boudoir one morning, she was interrupted by the entrance of her maid, with the card.

"My lady, his grace, the duke, sends his respects, and desires to know if your ladyship is disengaged and will receive him!"

"Certainly, show his grace in," replied Lady Etheridge, laying aside her book, and beginning to tremble with instinctive apprehension of the scene that was coming.

The duke entered. Lady Etheridge rose to receive him, soon to a chair, and resumed her own seat.

"I hope I find you quite recovered from the effects of your late agitation?" said the duke, as he seated himself near her.

"Quite, I thank you. No effect remains but the pleasant one of a lively gratitude to my preserver," replied Rose, in a low voice.

"There was nothing to be grateful for. Would, indeed, that I could be as happy as to merit your—I dare not say gratitude, but—favor." He paused, in that embarrassment that must always attend the avowal of a deep love.

"I feel that I have much, very much, to be grateful for in all your grace's family, who were very kind to me while yet my prospects were very questionable. And as for the chief of that fearful night, though they shook me so much, I would go through all that agony of terror again for the consolation it has brought me in the returning kindness of dear friends," said Rose, in a voice of emotion, and with her soul's deep emotion, and with her blue eyes full of tears.

Her words, her whole her tones, betraying the profound love of her own pure heart, thrilled him to the very depths of his soul. He could have thrown himself at her feet and covered her hands with passionate kisses; and though he restrained himself, his whole frame shook, and his voice trembled with the curbed passion of his soul, as he took her hand, and said:

"Lady Etheridge, you grievously misunderstand me if you suppose that since those days of our first acquaintance at Bereseligh Court my heart has changed, except in loving you more and more deeply day by day. Rose, dear Rose! I was a poor man, with only a barren title and a debt-encumbered property to offer you. You were an inexperienced country girl, scarcely conscious of your advantages at the heiress of one of the oldest baronies and largest fortunes in England. I knew that were you once introduced into society, your beauty, rank and wealth would afford you the widest field of choice among the most distinguished suitors, who would be sure to lay their hearts and their fortunes at your feet. You had no worldly father or managing mother to warn you of these things. Should I, then, take advantage of your isolation and inexperience to thrust myself between you and your more brilliant prospects? Rose, no; I saw you launched upon the sea of fashion, saw you courted by the most illustrious parties in the realm, and with a heart wasting for your love, I kept aloof, for, Rose, I loved you so truly that I was willing to sacrifice my own happiness for your welfare; and no man truly loves a woman who is not willing to do likewise, if necessary."

He paused from deep emotion, and Rose, with her eyes full of tears, faltered for the the words:

"Oh, it was very generous, very noble; but if you had had more simple faith in a woman's heart, you would have saved us both some months of misunderstanding and pain."

"Nay, sweet one, had I prematurely thrust myself upon your favor, should have reproached myself for such egotistical precipitancy, and perhaps been haunted by the thought that I had intervened between you and a more brilliant destiny. But now that I have observed you through the season, and seen you discourage the advances of those whom the dowagers call 'the most desirable parties in town,' now, Rose, I venture, with a free conscience, to lay my poor strawberry leaves at your feet."

For all answer, Rose silently placed her hand in his. He pressed that fair little hand to his lips, saying:

"And now, dear Rose, I will seek my mother and make her happy by sending her to embrace her daughter-in-law."

"No, not yet," murmured Rose, in a faint voice.

"Not yet, my love; what means my Rose?"

"I have shown you my heart, you know that it is all our own, and since that knowledge makes you happier, I do not regret that you possess it, but—"

She paused in the most painful embarrassment.

"But what, sweet Rose?"

"You do not know upon what an obscure brow it is that you offer to place the ducal coronet of Bereseligh."

"I do not understand you, dear Rose."

"Oh," she broke forth, vehemently, "I would the play were over."

Her lover looked at her with a painful perplexity. She went on:

"The world calls me Lady Etheridge of Swinburne, but I am no more Baroness Etheridge than I am the Empress Catharine of Russia."

"My dear Rose?"

"I am not; I feel that I am not."

"But the House of Lords—"

"Has made a mistake; not for the first time the highest tribunal in the realm has done so."

"Lady Etheridge, the chain of evidence that established your claim is complete, even to the satisfaction of the most conservative of those old peers. What reason have you then, to think that a mistake has been made?"

"No external reason, perhaps, but a deep-seated internal conviction that all this delusive glory of mine is a mere passing pageant. I am but a poor little robin in the plumage of a glorious parroquette, or a poor deer in the skin of a lioness; or a little plover baroness who must sustain her part as well as she can until the play is done, and then sink into her real insignificance. But, oh, what a heavy payment fate may exact for this masquerade with which she is amusing me. I can fancy how the world that offers me nothing but adulation now, will then follow my vanishing form with laughter and scorning. Some, I know, would pity the poor girl who had been made so great a fool of by fortune."

"Oh, Rose, could it be as your morbid imagination forbodes, could you be so deceived in the composition of attributes of rank and wealth, believe it, to me you would ever be the same—the dearest treasure of my life," said the duke, earnestly.

"It will be as I said. I shall be plucked of all my borrowed plumage; stripped of all my false splendor; I shall be again the poor little Rose of former days, only a little wiser and sadder for my experience of these. I deem it necessary to tell you of this strong convic-ti-on of mine with all the emphasis of swearing to a fact, so that you may know for a certainty that you are offering your ducal cofonet, not to the Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne, but to a poor cottage girl who is forced to play that part for a season, and plays it ill enough, no doubt."

"And even if this were so, nay, grant for a moment that it is so, that you are the humble village maiden that you seemed a year ago, I tell you that I love and honor you beyond all other creatures; I entreat you to be my wife, and assure you that your acceptance of my suit will make me the happiest, as your rejection of it would leave me the most miserable among men. Now, dearest, give me your hand in token that you are mine."

"Not yet!"

"Not yet! What now, dearest Rose?"

"There are other things yet that you must hear before committing yourself."

"What can they be? Speak, dear Rose, for I do not understand to what you allude, and I am certain only of one thing—that nothing you have to tell shall separate us. You are mine only, and forever."

"Listen first. Supposing me to be that humble cottage girl that I was a year ago, and that I may be again a year hence; and granting that, as such, you thought me not unworthy to share your rank, still you would like to see that you had won the first love of my heart, for every man delights in believing that he possesses that first, as well as the only love, of the maiden whom he seeks to make his wife. Is it not so?"

"Rose, in the name of Heaven, what mean you?"

"That you, George, Duke of Bereseligh, had not the first love of the poor girl whom you ask to become your wife."

"Rose! Good Heaven, what is this you are about to tell me?"

"That poor Rose's heart was lost and won long before she knew the Duke of Bereseligh."

"Oh, girl, girl! how cruelly you have trifled with my happiness and your own peace! You love another!" exclaimed the duke, starting to his feet in great agitation.

"No, no, you mistake me—widely mistake me. I do not love another; that great delusion is long since quite over," said Rose, blushing at her own vehemence.

"Explain, explain, in the name of Heaven, explain!" cried her lover, has tily returning to his seat.

"Listen, then, and oh! listen patiently. Your agitation frightens and unnerves me," faltered Rose.

"Forgive me, dearest; I will be calm," replied her lover, controlling himself by an effort.

"Two years ago, when I was a poor village girl, living with my reputed mother, there came a stranger to our village. He was handsome, accomplished, and very fascinating. Under the name of William Lovel, he sought and made my acquaintance. I was a romantic dreamer, longing for a higher, freer, and more beautiful life than our social circumstances permitted. William Lovel appeared to me to be the embodiment of perfect beauty, wisdom and goodness—the being destined to lead me up to that higher life to which I aspired."

"Oh, heaven and earth, the old story —it is the old story," groaned the duke.

"He loaned me books, he gave me instruction, he cultivated my taste in art and literature, he sought and won my love—nay, do not start and frown —he won my love—no more."

"Go on, go on."

"You know the story of the ex-Baroness Etheridge, and know how I, unworthy that I was, arose upon that noble lady's fall."

"Yes, yes, dearest, I know the particulars of that event; proceed, proceed."

"It was while this noble lady was still called the Baroness Etheridge that I met upon the day preceding that fixed for her wedding with Mr. Albert Hastings, that William Lovel accomplished, en route, for a private marriage."

"And you consented? Unhappy girl!"

"Yes, I consented—weakly and wickedly consented—to marry him clandestinely that same evening."

"Unfortunate child. Oh, Rose! Rose!"

"Bear with me—I consented, but I was providentially saved from the consummation of that folly, and, at the same time, forever cured of my dangerous infatuation."

"Thank Heaven for that. Go on—go on."

"That same afternoon upon which I promised to meet him at a later hour to be secretly married, I was sent by my poor foster-mother with her last message to Lady Etheridge, at Swinburne Castle. I was shown up into the library, where the lady sat, with the title deeds of the Swinburne estates before her, waiting for the arrival of her betrothed husband, Albert Hastings, that she might put them in his hands, and endow him with the whole property. While I was still with the lady, the expected visitor entered, and in Albert Hastings, the betrothed husband of Lady Etheridge, I recognized William Lovel, my lover."

"Good Heaven!"

"I was saved! My misplaced love died hard, but it did die. The new love could at the same time deceive the noble lady who endowed him with her princely fortune, and the humble maiden who gave him her whole heart—the man who could deliberately plan the destruction of that confiding maiden upon the very eve of his marriage with that high-souled lady, was unworthy of regret, unworthy of remembrance, unworthy of everything except total oblivion," said Rose, with a beautiful and solemn expression.

"Give me your dear hand! Rose, you are an angel."

Rose shook her head with a sad smile, and said:

"There never was a woman with more imperfect antecedents to acknowledge than I. There is yet another event that I must make known to you—an event connected with my earlier youth."

"What! another secret, dear Rose! a third secret!"

"A third secret!"

"I will not hear it! Only assure me that your heart and heart are perfectly free, and that you are willing to bestow them upon my unworthy self, and I shall be happy."

"My hand and heart are free, and they are yours, if you want them; yet you should know this third secret of my life."

"I will not hear it! Dear Rose, you are mine as I am yours! Is it not so?"

For all answer she placed her hand in his.

He pressed that small, fair hand fervently to his lips.

"And yet I would that you would hear what I have yet to tell you," she said, very earnestly.

"No more, dear girl, no more! Thus to put you into the confessional were unmanly and ungenerous. What you have already told me is enough to prove the candor and purity of your heart. Say only that you are mine! Say it, dear Rose."

"I am yours."

Ferrol in Summer Time

With all its delights summer has its dangers and its drawbacks as well. Not the least of these is the depressing and enervating effect which the hot weather has on persons with run down or naturally weak constitutions. The appetite flags, the digestion weakens, and the system becomes an easy prey for the numerous diseases peculiar to the season.

It is, therefore, of prime importance that the system should be kept up to the mark, and in no other way can this be done so effectively and with such absolute certainty as by taking three times a day, as per instructions. FERROL is a concentrated food scientifically prepared, pleasant to take and easy to digest.

FERROL is not a patent mystery. The formula is freely published. It is prescribed by the best Physicians. It is endorsed by the most eminent Medical Journals. It is used in prominent Hospitals, Sanitariums, etc.

Notice to Creditors.

In the matter of the estate of Joseph Hinch, late of the Township of North Fredericksburgh, in the County of Lennox and Addington, Farmer, deceased.

Notice is hereby given pursuant to the Revised Statutes of Ontario, 1897, Chapter 129, that all creditors and others having claims against the estate of the said Joseph Hinch, who died about the 18th day of October, A.D. 1906, are required on or before the first day of December, A.D. 1906, to send by post, pre-paid, or deliver to G. F. Ruttan, of the Town of Napanee, solicitor for the Executrices of the estate of the said deceased, their Christian and surnames, addresses and descriptions, the full particulars of their claims, the statement of their accounts and the nature of the securities, if any, held by them.

And that after such last mentioned date the said Executrices will proceed to distribute the assets of the said deceased among the parties entitled thereto, having regard only to the claims of which they shall then have notice, and that the said Executrices will not be liable for the said assets or any part thereof to any person or persons of whose claims notice shall not have been received by them at the time of such distribution.

Dated at Napanee this Twenty-fifth day of October, A.D. 1906.

432 Solicitor for Executrices.

The same day the Duchess of Bereseligh was informed of the engagement, and a few days later, the betrothal of the Duke of Bereseligh to the Baroness Etheridge, of Swinburne, was announced to the world.

CHAPTER XXII.

The announcement of the betrothal of the Duke of Bereseligh and the Baroness Etheridge, of Swinburne, surprised no one, for, as usual, the world knew all about the affair long before the parties most concerned knew anything of it.

Only Colonel Hastings was astonished, and Mr. Albert Hastings shocked.

"I thought she would have preferred to exercise her power a little longer before surrendering her liberty," said Colonel Hastings, musingly.

"I thought she would not soon forget. I always loved that girl, and I believe that she loved me. I did not think that any woman I loved could have existed so soon," said Mr. Hastings, indignantly.

"Ah, my dear fellow, her passion did not go into a gentle decline in the natural way of such transitory things, it was put to a violent death," said the colonel, with a shrug.

"Yes; by the shock she received in recognizing you in the castle. Well, it is all over now," sighed Albert Hastings.

"Also! if there is one thing in this world more tiresome than another, it is to hear a person repeat the story of things over and over again to people upon whom you can make no sort of impression. I have just told you that if, instead of the Duke of Bereseligh, it were a royal duke to whom she was betrothed, would, with a word, break the marriage off."

Albert Hastings looked at his worthy father in incredulous astonishment.

"Yes—you doubt me; but wait a few days, and see if you do not have the breaking out of this intended marriage

TOWN COUNCIL.

Council Chambers,
Monday, Nov. 5th, 1906.

Council met in regular session on Monday evening, Mayor Lowry presiding.

Members present — Councillors Kimmerly, Simpson, Williams, Graham and Mott.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and on motion were approved.

A communication was received from Mr. S. A. Armstrong, inspector of Asylums, Toronto, calling the attention of the Council to the passing of a recent statute which requires every municipality contributing a sum less than $1.50 per week to pay to the Asylum 75c per patient per day for all patients admitted. Laid on table until next regular meeting.

A petition was received from Mr. Peter Bristol and others, asking for an arc light near his place on Petit Hill. Referred to the Fire, Water and Light Committee to report.

The Finance Committee asked for further time to report re grant to Hay Bay ferry.

The Finance Committee reported that the bonds of the Collector, Mr. William Rankin, P.M., and of the Treasurer, Mr. E. S. Lapum, P.M., and of the Treasurer, Mr. E. S. Lapum, for $8,000 each, had been received and passed upon by the Town Solicitor.

The Fire, Water and Light Committee reported that accounts of Maddole & Wilson for $32, and R. J. Wales for $13.95, were correct, and recommended payment.

A by-law extending the time of paying the taxes for 1906, in order to get the one per cent. discount, until the 15th day of November, was given its several readings and passed.

Moved by Coun. Simpson, seconded by Coun. Williams, that the Street Committee prepare at once an estimate of the cost of extending the canning factory sewer to Dundas street, to report thereon to the Finance Committee, and that the latter Committee do then consult with the Town Solicitor and prepare a by-law to issue debentures to cover the cost of said extension, and that the Finance Committee do also have prepared a by-law to issue debentures for $5,000 to cover the indebtedness incurred by the construction of the Dundas street sewer. Carried.

A motion that a rate of 25c per 16 candle power per month be charged all consumers of electricity until such time as meters are put in, after which they shall put on the meter at 10c per kilowatt, was carried.

On motion the Napanee Public Library was given the usual grant of $250.

Moved by Coun. Simpson, seconded by Coun. Mott, that Mr. J. T. Grange be authorized to help the Treasurer, Mr. Mill, to post his books in order that the auditing of the same may be facilitated and that the Finance Committee be empowered to procure the necessary books for the incoming Treasurer. Carried.

The following accounts were ordered paid:—Sam Howard $40.35, Chas. Pollard $5.50, W. L. Bennett $4.00, Jas. Hinch $2.00, Napanee Express $2.00, J. F. Smith & Son $66.00, Maddole & Wilson $56.45, Maddole & Wilson $40.00, Jas. Richardson 65c, E. B. Perry $20.00, C. A. Anderson $3.25, E. Kelly $4.50, J. M. Graham $29.65.

The following accounts were referred:—Dr. R. A. Leonard $15.00, Maddole & Wilson $237.84, John Wilson $15.00.

On motion the Council adjourned.

Sometimes It Is Your Fault

When transactions with a business house go wrong, or when adjustment seems slow.

No store is perfect; blunders will happen—although with our perfected system it is remarkably seldom.

Now then how shall blunders be most quickly righted?

If you learned the salesperson's name, or if you have a friend in the house upon whom you feel disposed to lean, mention the name and your wishes in the letter—never write to an individual but address the house.

If letters are addressed to individuals, salespeople or section managers they remain unopened in the individual's absence, and even if delivered are sometimes neglected or forgotten.

Letters to the house are delivered to the proper person for attention and are followed up by the office. Another thing in leaving a parcel to be called for or in having it delivered, always give your name in full.

It's all simple, sure, direct, when you help us to help you.

SALE OF WOMENS' XMAS UMBRELLAS

With Silver Handles, $1.50 Each.

An Umbrella manufacturer was getting ready for stock taking. We happened along when he was ready to loose profits. The result is that next THURSDAY, NOV. 15th, we place on sale about sixty Women's Umbrellas at Sale Price $1.50 each. The handles come well assorted in several variations of silver and silver and pearl. We will display them in window a few days before sale. We think when you see them that you will agree with us when we say they look like two fifty goods. We will hold any of them for delivery day before Xmas if you wish.

ANOTHER SHIPMENT OF WINE DRESS GOODS

We were right in our forecaste that Wine Dress Goods would be absolutely correct. We started the season with a full Wine list of shades and everyone has been a success. We have just received another lot of many Wine shades, beautiful shades, not too light and not too dark. They look their best in the new weaves and finishes in our Satin Cloths, Amazons, Broadcloths, Poplins, Velutina. Good assortments to choose from at 50c, 75c, $1.00, 1.25, 1.50 and 2.00.

Ladies' Fur Lined Jackets.

The manufacturers tell us that they cannot begin to keep up with the orders this season for this very popular Jacket. We are selling so many that the jackets are generally sold before we get them from the makers. We expect another shipment this week, and we would advise any person who intends to purchase this season to do so now. We are also prepared to make-to-order as we have a large range of linings and collars in stock.

Fur Robes.

In connection with our Fur Department we have placed a full assortment of Robes. You will do well to visit us before making your purchase in this line.

GRAY GOAT ROBES. A very special in a dark rich colored robe, 56x66, at $7.50.

BLACK GOAT ROBES, same size at $10.00.

ESQUIMO DOG ROBES, in extra large sizes, at $15 and $18.

SASKATCHEWAN BUFFALO ROBES. We cannot recommend this robe too highly. It is perfectly waterproof and cannot be torn. Sold in size 54x62 at $8.00, and 54x72 at $9.00.

Don't forget our Repair Department. Work done at moderate cost by Expert Furrier.

(Xmas is Coming.)

A Choice Selection of Rugs, Runners and Leaders?

With the increased use of Rugs instead of Carpets going to the walls is an extra demand for the smaller Rugs.

Runways between doors, front of pianos, divans, archways call for the mat sizes. Halls call for the long narrow Runners. Our range is now very large to choose from. About one hundred to pick from, at 75c to $8.50. A few nice Rugs brighten up a home very much.

Are You Interested About New Carpets.

If so, let us show you some new arrivals that have been placed in stock during the last few days. The colorings and designs are very select. Heavy rich Axminsters and Wiltons along with Brussels are all represented in the new ones.

ENGLISH AXMINSTER with borders 1-2 and 5-8 yd. wide, 1.50, 1.75 and 2.00 yd.

NEW WILTONS, extra heavy quality, very rich design, 2.00 yd.

BRUSSELS. Our old friend for long life and hard wear, 1.00, 1.25 and 1.40.

WINDOW SHADES OR ROLLER BLINDS.

Don't forget that we have a very complete stock of shades and that we make a specialty of supplying new houses and new buildings with new shades throuout. Estimates given on contract work. Plain shades, spring, roller and fixtures, from 25c up. Lace or insertion trimmed from 50c up.

MORE NEW GOLF JACKETS.

Made from nice fine soft wool. White with red piping, white with blue piping, navy with white, red with white. Can be hooked up close at neck, suitable for the winter season, $2.00.

SMALL DOYLIES.

We have several kinds of Doylies for table use. Fringed linen, 10c, 12 1-2c. Swiss appliques, 5 and 10c. Teneriffe, 10c, 12 1-2c, 15c, 25c, 35c.

FANCY BACK AND SIDE COMBS.

No wonder that the ladies are taking kindly to our fancy back and side combs. We get them direct from the American makers, and in the better kinds we only show one of a kind. They are nice, they are exclusive, they are reasonable in price.

(Xmas is Coming.)

Stanfield's Unshrinkable Woolen Underwear for Men.

Stanfield's Unshrinkable Underwear is always easy and comfortable because it fits like a second skin and won't shrink. It is the most durable, warmest and most comfortable Underwear that we have ever been able to get. Every garment is guaranteed unshrinkable. If it shrinks bring it back. We will replace it for you without charge

OVERCOATS FOR MEN, YOUTHS, BOYS AND CHILDREN.

Our Overcoats are made from medium to full lengths. The Fly Front Overcoats have velvet collars. The D. B. Overcoats are mostly made with collars of same goods. The up-to-date style has the characteristic flare in the skirt.

Plain Blacks, Dark Greys, Checks in grey and mixtures, stripes and herringbones

We invite your inspection of this our largest assortment of Overcoats ever attempted.

Big Shirts for Big Men.

We take a great deal of trouble to get shirts for all sizes of men. We can outfit any man no matter how large he is. Shirts big enough for big men are hard to get, but the big men are coming to us because they find we carry a stock to fit them. Big shirts in black Sateen, Striped Duet or in Fancy —Sitting in a rocking chair at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Frank H. Gardner, Cape Vincent, N.Y., Mrs. Abram Ruttan uttered an exclamation and expired. Deceased, born in, Napanee, in 1841, was the daughter of Samuel and Clarinda Gordon. In 1861, she was married to Abram Ruttan, and came to reside in that town. Years ago had resided in and made her home with her daughter, Mrs. Gardner, in Cape Vincent. She was a member of the Main Street Methodist church, Picton, and was an earnest and conscientious Christian. Two children survive her, W. A. Ruttan and Mrs. Gardner. The remains were taken to Picton for burial.—Gazette.

CHORAL CLUB.

At a business meeting of the Ladies' Musical Club, Monday evening, it was decided to form a Choral Club in connection with it, for ladies' voices, to study choruses and part songs during the coming winter. The practices will be held every Tuesday evening at eight o'clock in the Town Hall, under the able directorship of Mrs. VanLaven, with the intention of giving recitals later in the season. The membership fee is one dollar. All ladies and young girls over fifteen who wish to become a member of this club are requested to attend the first meeting on Tuesday evening next, 13 inst., at eight o'clock. Mrs. Macnaughton, Sec.-Treas.

—A lot of correspondence, school reports, etc., is laid over until next week.

Hiram Lemon, Morven, has purchased Mr. D. W. McDonald's farm at Collins' Bay.

—This week Mr. Denis Lake sold his trotting mare, Maude Wilkes, to Mr. Thomas Stewart, Desoronto. Price $350.

—A new coat of paint has been applied to the front of The Robinson Co. store, which adds greatly to its appearance.

Horse Blankets. A complete line of first class blankets, at right prices.

—Miss Sarah McKillop passed away Saturday morning, aged sixty-five years. Deceased was housekeeper for the late Robert Denison for a number of years, and when he died he left her his entire property. She only survived him about five weeks.

—Rev. F. E. Roy will address the congregations of St. Paul's, Sandhurst, and St. Alban's, Adolphustown, on Sunday, Nov. 11th, in behalf of Trinity College, Toronto. Divine service will be held in St. Jude's church, Gosport, the evening of that day at seven o'clock.

—It is rumored that Councillor Meng will be a candidate for the Mayoralty in January. He has had four years' experience in the Town Council, and four years in the County Council, and was also Reeve of North Fredericksburgh, which should qualify him for the position he aspires to.

—Mr. J. J. Tilley, Inspector of Public Schools, will deliver an address in the public at the Model School, on Wednesday next, 14th Nov., at 2.45 p.m. Subject—"The training and payment of teachers." This is a much debated subject at present, and should call forth a good attendance.

—The Napanee Ladies' Musical Club will hold their first club meeting on Saturday, Nov. 10th, at 3.30 p.m., in the Town Hall. Topic—"Mendelssohn, his life and compositions." Any ladies not having yet joined and wishing to become members, kindly intimate at this meeting or give their names to Mrs. Cairns-Smith, Rec. Secy.

TWILIGHT RECITAL.

A most enjoyable hour was spent by our music-loving friends at a Twilight Recital given by the Napanee Ladies' Musical Club, at the Town Hall, Saturday afternoon, Nov. 3d. A more able and unique introduction to this newly formed club could not have been given by our talented friends. The programme consisted of

Organ solo	Meredith Pontifex
	Mrs. Cairns Smith
Vocal solo	Love's Solace ..... Willis
	Miss J. Light.
Piano solo	Valse in E ..... Moskowski
	Miss Lake.
Whistling solo	Mazurka .....
	Mrs. J. VanLaven
Vocal solo	(a) Ich liebe dich ..... Grieg
	(b) I know a lovely Garden ..... Guy D'Hardelot
	Miss Cairns.
Vocal Trio	Bonnie Doon ..... Burns
Mrs. Burritt, Mrs. Herrington, Mrs. VanLaven
Vocal solo	Serenade to Juanita ..... Jouberti
	Mrs. J. VanLaven
Piano solo	Cachoucha Caprice ..... Raff
	Miss L. Hall.
Vocal solo	Rose Songs ..... Gaynor
	Mrs. Burritt.
	National Anthem

We hope that the club will ever flourish, having for its members zealous workers, so that a creation of high assolutions for the finer art may ultimate in Napanee being considered a town of musical talent. We could not but notice the suggestion of refinement in the decoration of the room so tastefully did Mrs. Shibley and those assisting perform their part.

WILTON.

There will not be any service in the Methodist church here on Sunday, as the regular quarterly service will be held at Violet, and conducted by the Rev. Enos Farnsworth, Verona. Rev. R. J. A. Whattam will take charge of the work at Yarker.

REWARDS OF MISSIONARIES

Acts Which Gladden the Hearts of Those Who Are Helpful and Loving to Their Fellow Men—Correct Report of Popular View of the Hardships Endured by Missionaries in Far Off Foreign Lands.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1906, by Frederick Dwyer, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 4.—In this sermon the preacher shows the brighter side of human experience and how daily the rewards and encouragements that gladden the hearts of those who are loving and helpful to their fellow men. The text is Acts xxvii. 2, "And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness."

A great book is yet to be written under the caption "The Bright Side of a Foreign Missionary's Life." When famous missionaries like Bishop William Taylor used to visit my father's home when I was a boy I would stand afar off and look at them as the Florentine people used to watch the passing Dante. After the famous Italian author returned to the city of his youth his neighbors always said that there appeared upon the crown of his head a spot like unto that which has been in hell." So for years I felt that a foreign missionary field was such an inferno as Dante described. I felt that it was a place inhabited by savages and cannibals. I felt that when a man like Dr. Duff or William Carey or David Livingstone decided to go to India or Persia or Africa or to the Fiji Islands he went to live among monsters. Missionaries cut adrift from all heart affections. They forever separated themselves from the humanities and the kindnesses and the loves of their fellow men. But after I took a journey around the world and visited a few of the great missionary stations I had a complete change in reference to my ideas of a missionary's sacrifices. True, the missionary has to give up many things for Christ, but what he gives up is small compared to the joys which he has in missionary service. The faithful foreign missionary has the same kind of daily kindnesses shown to him in his missionary labors as the home pastor has by his congregation which surrounds him week by week and year by year. The only difference between the work of the home pastor and that of the missionary to the heathen is that the one is a settled minister over one pulpit in a civilized land, while the foreign missionary labors in virgin soil, and, like Hunter Corbett or Bishop Thoburn, is a traveling evangelist, with many pastors under his control, of whose work he is superintendent.

Though the foreign missionary may have many Joys, I can think of not one greater than his opportunity of traveling from place to place and of commune with the Christian native workers who have been laboring in Christ's vineyard during his absence. I have heard my uncle, the late Rev. John Talmage, the famous missionary to Amoy, China, say that the native pastors and the Chinese Christian workers would come out to greet him when he took his missionary tours. They would come forth with smiles and gospel salutations. They would send messengers everywhere to tell their absent members that their spiritual leader was coming. Then these Christian workers would gather about the missionary and tell him how the church was getting along and how many new converts were made and what a glorious revival they had been having. My uncle John would turn to my father and say: "Do Witt, their greetings make a regular Christian love feast. Oh, these missionary tours are mighty trips to me for spiritual inspiration! When I see what some of these poor native Christian workers are willing to do for Christ it does seem as though I could never do enough for the Master." Such was one of the joys I think Paul, the great foreign missionary, had when he was on his missionary tours.

Whenever Paul thought of going to Ephesus or Philippi or Galatia or Thessalonica or to the churches of Laodicea or Corinth I think he loved to say to himself: "Oh, if I can only take that trip I shall be able to preach the gospel to thousands who have never heard it preached, and I shall also meet the consecrated men and women of God who are laboring in those churches; they will all be there. They will greet me with their prayers and happy smiles. They will tell me about the successful campaigns for Christ in which they have been engaged. I can already see the joyful smiles around me and hear the glorious talks we will have after the preaching of the day is over. We shall meet together in some upper chamber, as Christ went off again and again in a quiet place with his disciples alone to hear and pray and have Christian communion." Such, I believe, were the joyful anticipations with which the mighty Jewish foreign missionary, went forth on his missionary tours.

Such, I believe, was one of the joys which were thrilling his heart when on his last journey to Rome. He knew he was to preach Christ under the shadow of Cæsar's palace. He knew that he would be welcomed in Rome by the saints who were living in Cæsar's household. Yes, Phoebe and Priscilla and Aquila, the women and men who were with him in the gospel, were there. Epaenetus was there, and Andronicus and Junia and Amplias and Urbane and Stachys and many other Christian workers were all in Rome. He distinctly tells this in the last chapter of his Epistle to the Romans. They were all there and ready to greet him. Yes, I think I hear him say as he is pacing up and down the Alexandria corn ship: "What a glorious time we shall have together!" Why cannot this boat have the wings of a bird instead of a heavy keel, that our reunion might come the sooner?" But hardly had he said these words than the Mediterranean euroclydon blew up and the ship was tossed about by the hurricane, and at last it was wrecked upon the island of Melita, which we call Malta. There the vessel was destroyed amid the affrighted people, who knew nothing of Paul; neither did he know of them. They were to the words of my text: "And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness." He might naturally have expected his friends to show him kindness. But here he records the fact as a grateful surprise. The barbarous people of faith" to greet us cordially, but the barbarians are kind also. The men and the women who do not profess to love the Master and belong not to our own class in society are nevertheless kind when we meet them. They are nearly always thoughtful. They are nearly always ready to aid and befriend Christ's messengers. I think it is due to them to make this fact known, and it may encourage workers also to have faith when they labor for Christ in unfamiliar fields they may find comfort from some stranger. Paul was happily surprised when he wrote, "And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness."

The barbarians or those who do not belong to the "household of faith" will often find in Christ's ministers the reference to their temporal wants. It in an emergency you are hungry, they will feed you. If your shipwrecked, as Paul was among the rocks of Melita, they will rush out in their boats to help you to land. If you are homeless, they will invite you to sit by their firesides. It is a characteristic of the barbarians that all the gentleness and all the kindnesses and all the helpfulness of life are not to be expected from the followers and the disciples of the "lowly Nazarene." I may seem to be making a sweeping statement, but in my personal experience I can affirm that if a man, either afoot or in wagon, will speak kindly to those who live in pueblo cities and travel through the country ninety-nine people out of every hundred whom he meets upon the road will greet him with a smile and will be willing to go out of their way to do him a favor if it is in their power to do. Of course a large per cent. of these people will not be members of the Christian churches, but they all, with very few exceptions, will be kind to him, as the barbarians were kind to Paul when shipwrecked upon the Melita shoals.

The universal kindness of the common people was quaintly illustrated some years ago by the late Mayor McLane of Baltimore, who told this story of a well-known railroad man. A number of the road called upon this man and asked for a pass to a certain distant point. He had been working for us for some time, have you not?" "Yes," answered the employe. "You have always been paid regularly?" "Yes, sir." "Well, now, supposing you were working for a railroad and you had the nerve to ask this farmer to harness up his horses and drive you a long distance for nothing, what do you?" answered the man, "I would not. But if the farmer had his horses already to go anyway and was going my way there is not a farmer living who would refuse to give me a lift." That is the kind characteristics of the class. They are always willing to help their neighbors. To use the phrase of the railroad employe, they are ready to give each other a "lift." Almost every man who is doing rough clothes is at heart a kind man. Almost every woman who toils for her daily bread is generally a kind woman. The heart of the poor is a generous heart. It is a loving, a gentle, a helpful heart. When we go from the higher walks of life among the common people we will be happily surprised to find that most people are kindly disposed. Wherever we may go, even as the barbarians of Malta went out of their way to care for the kind shipwrecked crew of the Alexandria corn ship.

Not only is the heart of the common people kind, but it is also tender, so called better social classes also is kindly. No matter among what social class we may find Christian workers we will find that everywhere the human heart is beating with gentleness and kindness. Everywhere people will go out of their way to do him a favor, as the barbarians cared for Paul and the shipwrecked crew straggling to land from the Alexandria corn ship.

But, if the human heart is ready to greet you kindly, how much more is it willing to be kind to you after you have been kind to the "household of the marginal. It shouts; it does not repel. It draws the best which is in every nature with its magnetic power. It will break the hard crusts of selfishness. It will make even adamantine hearts move with sympathy. Seven years ago at Wilbur's Point Gap, Charles King, a United States army officer, took an Apache boy, who had outlived its usefulness as a destroyer, and he wound it round and round with ties either of copper or silver. He charged this wire with an electric battery. The result, said an eye-witness, was most astounding. The old gun, which once hurled its missiles of death at an enemy now made the iron balls leap forward its gaping mouth. Instead of crushing out human lives, as it once did, it now reached down and lifted up to its muzzle a massive boulder, eight of many tons. "Wonderful, wonderful!" you say. Not nearly as wonderful is the miracle of love. Love is the greatest miracle in the drawing power of the gospel. Love is the key to God's heart. Love is the key to your heart. If you love it and want to serve it and to help it than at once that world will redouble its kindness and open its arms wide to greet your gospel message. And Christ himself recognized its power when he said, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." Of course I am talking about the human heart as a whole, and not about the human heart as in individual exceptions. Now, to prove what I say is true, turn to this story of Paul's intercourse with the Maltese barbarians.

Scene the first: It is a dark night. The wind is blowing a hurricane. Every one who can be indoors is in shelter. But I think in the early morning a shepherd is going out to find a lost sheep. He is a herdsman on the Island of Melita. One of the sheep slipped away from the fold, and he is out seeking her in the storm. As the shepherd climbs the cliffs overlooking the sea he mutters: "God pity the sailor. God pity the ship caught in such a sea." Then he puts his hands to his mouth and looks off to watch the tossing, tumbling billows. No sooner does he do this than he cries: "Alas, there is a ship! She is heading toward the rocks. She is helpless. Unless we help the crew they are lost." I see him running to the village, calling: "Help! Help! Help! Help! There is a ship being driven upon the rocks. Help! Help!" At once the men respond to his call. The barbarous people act just as the old Long Island farmer acted before the life-preserving stations had been built when the John Milton was wrecked near East Hampton. They ran with the ropes. They tied themselves together like Alpine climbers to reach out into the surf and draw the drowning men to shore. They did this merely for humanity's sake. They did this as most people of every nationality living along the coast would help a shipwrecked crew. They would have saved Paul, no matter to what nationality he might have belonged. That is the first scene.

But no sooner was Paul's blood seized and he knew that his friends were safe than he tried to find out how he could help his rescuers. While he is warming himself at the fire he hears one of the barbarians say, "Did you know that the father of Governor Publius is very sick?" "Who did you say was sick?" "Why, the governor's father," the barbarian replies. "Then," says Paul, "I will go and heal him." No sooner does Paul do this than the Melitans bring to him all those who were physically afflicted. Then what happened? Why, those barbarians just opened the doors of their homes. They said to Paul: "Come, Paul; come right in. Everything that we have is yours." Can you find this story revealed in the words of Luke, which goes thus: "So when this was done others also which had diseases in the island came and were healed, who also honored us with many honors"? Ah, yes, I have only to try to serve men and make sacrifices for men there will be no difficulty in trying to reach them with the gospel! Paul was able to preach Jesus unto the barbarians of Melita after he had healed their sick.

My brother, I believe the greatest drawback to the gospel among the heathen is that we are unwilling to personally make sacrifices for them. We refuse to go to the non-Christians, thrusting a Bible at them and forgetting how much more appealing we are to them in personal experience I can affirm that if a man, either afoot or in wagon, will speak kindly to those who live in pueblo cities and travel through the country ninety-nine people out of every hundred whom he meets upon the road will greet him with a smile and will be willing to go out of their way to do him a favor if it is in their power to do. STRANGE NATIVE RITES

In the virgin forests of that wonderful land, Australia, the ancient natives practiced their weird and mysterious rites of healing, and it is a question if we will ever now be known by modern men. Some of it, however, is known. The aborigines of Australia, the modern scientists have been amazed at the power of healing and clairvoyant that possessed by these ancient natives. When discovered by the white men, explorers, he wrote of them,—"It did not observe among them the use of any medicine without hair and teeth were full of life and activity." This would lead one to look for herbs to find the fact that they used their natural remedies as medicines. What stronger proof could be had than the fact that the herbs of the field and the trees of the forest contain the nature's medicine cheat for mankind? In Bileans for Biliousness, the great Australian household remedy, you have the finest known medicinal ingredients. From roots to herbs. They are purely vegetable. They are absolutely natural remedy for dyspepsia, Bradycky, Biliousness, constipation, piles, and all disorders arising from liver and stomach disorders.

It is now well known that liver, indigestion and kidneys can cause nervousness, insomnia, headache, backache, pains in the back, sides and all digestive disorders, tongue coated, bad taste in the mouth, foul breath, dizziness, specks before the eyes, pain in the head, feelings of uncomfortable fulness after eating, sallow complexion, debility, etc. They also act as a general tonic and by cleansing the blood and the whole system enable it to throw off colds, chills, etc. They improve the general circulation, and are a boon to pale faced girls and women. Bileans are for sale at 50 cents a box, or post free from the Bilean Co., Toronto, on receipt of price.

The Pandora Thermometer

The thermometer on the Pandora range oven means precisely in accuracy to the cook what the square and compass mean to the draftsman. Without the square and compass the draftsman would have to work entirely by guess, just as you do without an accurate and reliable thermometer on your oven.

The Pandora thermometer reduces cooking to an exact science. You know precisely how much heat you have and what it will do in a given time. It is one of the small things which makes the Pandora so much different and better than common ranges.

SURELY A SUCCESS.

The grand bazaar given by the ladies in aid of St. Patrick's church, in the Town Hall this week, was one of the most successful held in years. It is estimated that the receipts will exceed $1,000. Besides the bazaar and sale Rev. Father John Kehoe, Kingston, on Tuesday night, gave a most interesting lecture describing his travels in Italy, Switzerland and Ireland, illustrated by stereopticon views. On Wednesday night a grand musical entertainment was given by Mr. Chas. E. Milner, organist of St. Mary's Cathedral, Kingston, and local talent. A bountiful dinner was served at noon yesterday by the ladies in the Town hall, which was well patronized, and last night the affair was brought to a close with a grand drawing of prizes and progressive euchre party. Rev. Father O'Connor and those engaged with him in making the bazaar such a great success, wish to thank the public for their patronage and especially those who assisted in the musical entertainment.

IN TIME OF PEACE.

In the first months of the Russia-Japan war we had a striking example of the necessity for preparation. Those who had the early advantage of those who, to be early advantaged their roofs in time to speak, "have shingled their sides" by wet weather. The virtue of preparation has made history and given to our greatest men. The individual as well as the nation should be prepared for any emergency. Are you prepared to successfully combat the first cold you take? A cold can be cured much more quickly when treated at once than when contracted and soon as it has become settled in the system. Dr. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is famous for its cures of colds and it should be kept at hand for its certain use. For sale at The Hollcroft Drug Store. 44a

Saving Argument.

We are told that to be a benefactor to the human race one has to "make two blades of grass grow where one grew before," or what is practically the same thing, to make one dollar go as far as two went before. To do the latter is our business aim. The success of it is in the savings. Saturday, as our special sale day, we offer savings definite enough to double our sales, with every consideration for our many customers. To confront bona-fide bargains is the surest way to qualify for your friendship as well as your patronage. Saturday, Oct. 10th, there are two money saving propositions.

Lace Curtains.

50 pairs in all of Nottingham Curtains, 54 in. x 3 1-2 yds. long, very neat and dainty design, over locked edge, very appropriate for dining rooms or bedrooms. Now housecleaning time, this is a money saving opportunity. Worth 1.00 per pair regular, Saturday at 10 a.m., 69 cts. pair.

(Carpet Section.)

Housekeepers' Economies.

APPLIQUE SHAMS, RUNNERS AND SCARFS.

Women of experience in household matters will readily realize the significance of this special offering, to take advantage of which would certainly be exercising good judgment and showing the existence of a good business-like housekeeping policy.

Shams, 32x32. Runners, 18x36. Scarfs, 18x54. In the lot are a goodly assortment of neat, pretty and dainty designs all new and different to anything heretofore shown. Saturday at 10 a.m., 43 cts. each.

(Staple Section.)

"FURS"

A problem worthy of your earnest consideration. City stores are apparently making big inducements to get you to buy your furs there, offering a retund of your railway fare for a purchase of so much. What inducement is a few, very few dollars on a 150.00 or 200.00 jacket? What about your other expenses and time lost, and going amongst strangers on a fur proposition when you can do just as well and better and know who you are dealing with in regard to furs of quality. Make your purchases here, we have one price and the same to all, with no railway fares deducted and added too. Come to-day and see our extensive stock. We are Fur People and consider your valuable interests.

Men's Fur Coats from 30.00 to 75.00 each.
Ladies' Fur Jackets from 35.00 to 175.00.

as publicly announced as its contraction was. I shall call upon Lady Etheridge to-day."

This conversation took place in the breakfast parlor at Hastings House, as the father and son sat over their coffee and muffins.

Colonel Hastings was as good as his word, and in the course of the same day presented himself at Bereseleigh House, and sent in his card, with a request to see Lady Etheridge.

He received the answer that Lady Etheridge was engaged, and could not have the honor of seeing Colonel Hastings.

This was just what he had expected; so he went into a neighboring reading-room, whence he addressed a note to Lady Etheridge, to the effect that he wished to see her upon matters of the utmost importance, concerning herself mostly.

To this note he received an answer that any matters which Colonel Hastings had to communicate to Lady Etheridge must be addressed to her ladyship's solicitor.

Colonel Hastings was baffled for the time. He permitted a day to pass, and then addressed the following note to Lady Etheridge:

Hastings House, Sept. 12th, 18—.

Madam:—That which I have to communicate to your ladyship is a matter which you may not like to have confided even to your own solicitor, and which can be communicated to your ladyship alone. Abiding your ladyship's orders to wait upon you, I have the honor to be, madam, your obedient servant,

William Henry Hastings.

Rose took this note immediately to the duchess, who read it and laughed, saying:

"You are no daughter of Eve if you do not see the old gentleman, and find out what he means. See him, my love, see him; I confess to some curiosity."

Rose accordingly wrote a note to Colonel Hastings requesting him to call the succeeding day at twelve o'clock.

Punctually at noon the next day the colonel presented himself. He was shown at once into the library. Rose soon entered. This was the first occasion upon which Rose had ever met the father of her former lover. She advanced with cold dignity, saying:

"Colonel Hastings, I presume?"

"The same, madam. I have the honor of addressing Lady Etheridge?"

"Yes, sir. Will you be seated?"

"I thank you, madam," said the colonel, handing a chair to Lady Etheridge, and taking one for himself.

They sat down at opposite sides of the reading-table.

"You demanded an interview with me, sir; may I be informed for what purpose?" inquired Rose, coldly.

"I requested an interview with you, madam, in order to communicate a fact which came to my knowledge through my very intimate and confidential relations with the late baron, and which vitally concerns your present position and prospects."

"My—which concerns my present position and prospects! I do not understand you, sir."

"Your present position as Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne; your prospects as the affianced wife of the Duke of Bereseleigh."

"I am very sure that nothing which Colonel Hastings can have to communicate can in any way affect the one or the other," replied Rose, in so haughty a tone that the old gentleman lost some measure of his temper and self-control, as he said:

"We shall see that, madam. Your ladyship has heard of me, perhaps, as the lifelong, intimate friend of the late baron?"

Rose bowed, haughtily.

"You are also aware that I was left the guardian of the person and property of the young lady who was brought up as his heiress?"

Again Rose bowed in cold silence.

"You have also heard, perhaps, that upon the last day and night of the late baron's life, when he refused to see either physician or clergyman, he summoned me to his bedside, where I remained until he died?"

"I have heard so," said Rose, very coldly.

"On that last day and night of his life, the late Baron Etheridge of Swinburne confided to me a secret," said Colonel Hastings, pausing.

"Well, sir?"

"That secret, that fact, of which I am the only custodian, of which I only possess the proofs, would, if proclaimed, cast you down from your present high position from perjury and obscurity," said the colonel, slowly, watching the face of Rose to see the effect which his words produced.

She turned a shade paler, but made no comment.

"Do you not know whether this secret concerns you or not," said the colonel, sarcastically.

"Pray go on, sir; play the play out," replied Rose.

"That secret, that fact, with all its proofs, which, once divulged, would cast you down from wealth and rank to poverty and obscurity, is mine alone! and whether I shall ever be divulged rests with me and you alone! I only have the power of dashing the coronet of Swinburne from your brow; you only have the choice of bidding me close my lips forever or open them upon this subject."

"Pray proceed, sir; tell me what is in your power to divulge, and the terms of your silence," said Rose, sarcastically.

"I will. The secret confided in me on his death-bed, by the late Baron Etheridge, of Swinburne, together with the proofs for establishing the fact, was that of the existence of another, the only true heir of the barony of Swinburne, before whose claims the present holder must give up a stubble before the flame," said the colonel, solemnly.

"I am not surprised. It is just what my heart prophesied," thought Rose, within herself.

"You believe what I state, Lady Etheridge?"

"Yes, I believe it; I thoroughly believe it. Now, then, tell me the name of this rightful heir," said Rose, earnestly.

"Nay, Lady Etheridge; the name of that heir is a secret that I dare not confide, even to yourself, at first."

"Very well; then tell me the terms upon which you will forever close your lips upon the subject of this supposed heir," said Rose, with a sarcasm so fine as to escape the apprehension of the obtuse intellect of Colonel Hastings.

"Listen, then, Lady Etheridge—for Lady Etheridge you may remain to the end of your life, if you list. More than twelve months since, you were acquainting with my son, Mr. Albert Hastings."

"Nay, I never knew Mr. Albert Hastings," replied Rose, haughtily.

"Very well, then; let that pass. More than a year ago you knew a person calling himself William Lovell."

"A traitor, who had no right to the name that he assumed."

"Albert Hastings loves you, loves you only, has loved you ever!" said Colonel Hastings, earnestly.

"You are wandering from the point, sir. Mr. Albert Hastings' sentiments can be of no importance whatever to me. That which I would learn from you is this—what are the terms upon which you propose to suppress the existence of the true heir of Swinburne?" inquired Rose, coldly.

"I will suppress the existence of the real heir of Swinburne, and leave you in possession of your fictitious rank and wealth, upon the conditions that you will at once break off your impending marriage with the Duke of Bereseleigh, and contract your hand to your first lover, my son, Mr. Albert Hastings," said the old gentleman firmly.

"Never!" exclaimed Rose, with impassioned emphasis. "Better any suffering than the sin of depriving the rightful heir out of the estate. Better any fate than the folly of joining my life with that of a disgraced traitor as Albert Hastings has proved himself to be. To all of this I have one practical reply to make. I will immediately request the presence of the Duke of Bereseleigh here, and will request in his presence all that you have related to me," said Rose, pulling the bell-rope.

"Lady Etheridge, you are excited; calm yourself, pause, reflect," exclaimed Colonel Hastings, anxiously.

The door opened, and a footman appeared.

"Take my compliments to the Duke of Bereseleigh, and say that I request his grace to join us here."

"Lady Etheridge, you are mad! Countermand your order before it is too late," exclaimed the colonel, in an excited whisper.

But the servant had already bowed and withdrawn from the room, while the Duke of Lady Etheridge betrayed no signs of relenting.

"Now, then, if you will be so frantic, I shall withdraw; yet I beseech you be careful; take time to reflect; do not commit yourself rashly; take time to weigh consequences, and, if you should come to a different decision, a note directed to my lodgings will always find me. Be cautious not to betray your own interests, and I, on my part, shall be careful to guard this secret for yet a few days longer."

Footsteps were now heard approaching, and the colonel, hastily departed, hastily withdrew.

He had scarcely made his escape when the Duke of Bereseleigh entered.

Rose was walking excitedly up and down the floor.

"I thought to have found Colonel Hastings here."

"No, he has run away. He came hither to intimidate a woman, not to face a man," said Rose, excitedly.

The duke stood still and looked at her in amazement for a moment, and then, leading her to a seat, said:

"Sit down and compose yourself, dearest Rose, and tell me calmly what has occurred."

"First, it is as my heart prophesied, dear George, and I am not the heiress of Swinburne."

"Forgive the question, dearest Rose, and tell me what reason, beyond your own fancy, you have for saying so."

"The old man who had just left me has said so. He declares that when he attended my late father in his last hours, the baron confided to him the secret of the existence of an heir to the barony and castle of Swinburne, together with every proof necessary to establish his rights. Colonel Hastings offered to suppress these facts and destroy the proofs if I would marry his son, and threatened to produce the heir and establish his rights by the proofs in his possession, if I refused."

"And you, dearest, you replied to him as he deserved?"

"I replied that I was to say to your grace all that he had said to me, and I rang and sent a message requesting you to join us, whereupon Colonel Hastings hurried away."

"And what do you think of this strange communication, love?" inquired the duke, smiling.

"It confirms the prophetic feelings of my heart; I feel that it must be true," replied Rose, gravely.

"And I believe it to be essentially false! This man has probably heard of your morbid forebodings upon the subject of your inheritance, which is a secret to your friends, and he has sought to practice upon your credulity for his own purposes. That is all."

"But I credit this story, though I cannot trust him. And, believing the same as I do, pray tell me what must I do?"

"Nothing, simply nothing."

"Is there no way of compelling him to produce the heir and the proofs of which he speaks?"

"No way in the world that I know, unless you now the name of that heir."

"Can he not be compelled to divulge the name?"

"No, he cannot be compelled to give the name, or to produce the heir or the proofs even if, after all, such proofs exist, which, I repeat, I do not believe. Your present reality is that which a great philosopher has termed 'masterly inactivity.' If such an heir exists, let Colonel Hastings bring him forward and prove his claims to the barony of Swinburne, when you will at once yield up your coronet. Nay, I will repeat to you that no change in my feelings or purposes can now say change in my feelings or purposes can now say change in my feelings or purposes can now say cepted, with a few conventional expressions of regret, that the young ladies should lose the advantage of the instructions of so accomplished a teacher. And the news got abroad in the household that Miss Elmer was going away.

It was about this time, in the interval between the morning and the afternoon session, that Miss Elmer was sitting alone in the vacant schoolroom, when there came a rap at the door.

"Come in," said Miss Elmer, expecting to see a servant with a message from Sir Vincent or Lady Lester.

Mr. Casslnove entered the schoolroom.

His face was pale, and his voice vibrated with intense suppressed emotion, as he said:

"I hope you will pardon this intrusion, and give me a few moments' interview, Miss Elmer."

"Certainly, Mr. Cassinove; pray take a seat," she said, handing a chair, and resuming her own place at her desk.

With a bow, he declined to sit down; but standing before her, and resting one hand upon the back of the chair, he said:

"You are about to leave us, I hear, Miss Elmer?"

"In a few weeks—yes."

Forgive the question—for another situation?"

"No; when one has discovered that she is not fitted for a particular work, she should abandon it; and when she has found that for which she is best adapted, she should pursue it. I have clearly ascertained that I am not fitted either by ability or inclination for the life of a governess, since I can make myself neither very useful nor very happy in its duties; while I have some little scribbling, by which I can give gift for scribbling, by which I can give more satisfaction, if not do more good. At least, it is my principal talent, and I purpose to give it a thorough trial. I purpose to give up teaching, take some quiet, pleasant lodgings, and maintain myself by my pencil, which already brings me a pittance sufficient for my few wants."

"You will be more independent, more retired and happier. I sincerely congratulate you on the change, Miss Elmer. The most humble life or liberty and seclusion is preferable to any life of dependence amid uncongenial associates. And since you speak of going into lodgings, will you permit me to recommend to you my late landlady, Mrs. Russel?"

"Thank you; I was thinking of her."

"She is a gentle and refined woman, unfit to struggle through the world, and hence she does not succeed very well. She has now a pretty little house at Chelsea, the ground floor of which is occupied with her own little shop and family rooms. The upper floor comprises a suite of three or four neat rooms, that she would be glad to let. I think you would like both the landlady and her lodgings."

"I am quite sure that I should. Please give me her exact address," said Laura taking up a pencil.

Cassinove complied, and while Laura was taking down the address, he gazed upon her beautiful, bowed face as she bent over her desk, until his own face rapidly flushed and paled, and his breath came short and quick.

She heard—her ear caught that quick, convulsive breathing—and she impulsively looked up just as he stooped and took her hand, and bowing over it, uttered in a tone scarcely above his breath, yet deep and vibrating with his soul's profound emotion:

"Lauren Elmer, I love you. I love you with my whole heart, soul and spirit. I loved you the first hour that I looked upon your noble face. I have loved you with an ever-increasing power ever since, as I shall love you through all time and through all eternity. I have suppressed the utterance of my love for months, as I ought, perhaps, yet I have suppressed it for years, but I could not be silent longer; I could not stifle my feelings and live. And so I sought you to-day, Laura Elmer, not in selfishness, not in vanity, not in presumption; not to engage your heart or bind your hand to a poor man, who must yet struggle through many years of labor, privation and hardship before he can command a position which he would dare ask you to share. No, Laura Elmer, my love to you to say that my heart, my brain, my services, my whole life are all your own; to say that I consecrate myself, with all that I am or may become, with all that I have or may acquire, to your service for life and death and eternity, and count myself richer than a monarch, more blessed than an archangel, so you will but accept the offering."

He paused, still breathing low and quick, and raised his eyes, eloquent with emotion, to hers.

Her face, that had been averted, was now turned gently toward him, where meeting her glances, he exclaimed:

"Oh, Heaven! your eyes are full of tears. You are not angry with me. My wish is not all wasted. You accept the ovation. Oh, Laura, Is it not so? Speak to me! Speak to me!"

She paused both her hands in both of his, with a glance that told all he wished to know.

His clasped those white hands and pressed them rapturously to his lips, to his heart, amid exclamations of love and delight, that left him blind, deaf and insensible to all else on earth or in heaven, blind, deaf and insensible to the presence of Sir Vincent Lester, who had entered the schoolroom unannounced, and who now stood gazing upon the love scene with his dark and handsome face lowering with evil passions, until Laura Elmer raised her eyes, and with a slight exclamation recognized him and started to her feet.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Elmer; but if this had been another than the schoolroom I should not have entered unannounced," said the baronet, with bitter sarcasm.

Ferdinand Cassinove stood up, and taking the hand of Miss Elmer, confronted Sir Vincent with a proud and joyous expression upon his fine face saying:

"Sir Vincent Lester, I have the honor to announce to you my engagement to Miss Elmer, who has just honored my life with the promise of her hand."

"I congratulate you, sir; though your announcement of your engagement of so evident a fact seems rather a work of supererogation," said the baronet, with mocking hauteur.

Mr. Cassinove bowed coldly.

"And now, sir," continued Sir Vincent, "at the time of an engaged man must be much more valuable to himself than at any one else, I have to inform you that I must, from this day, deny myself your inestimable services, and such of your leisure from my house at your earliest convenience."

Again Cassinove bowed ceremoniously, saying:

"You have anticipated my wishes and purposes in this matter, Sir Vincent. My term is up to-morrow, when I shall relieve you of my presence."

"Pray do not feel obliged to serve to the end of the term for which you were engaged. I quite willingly release you from your engagement, and desire that, whether you go to-day or to-morrow, the time of your departure shall make no difference in the amount of your wages—a matter of small consequence, unimportant, I presume, to a young gentleman who is thinking of seeting up an establishment. Therefore, stand not upon the order of your going, but go at once. If you hope to get another situation, however, do not come to me for a character. I cannot conscientiously recommend as a teacher who passes his time in making love to the governess, and chooses the schoolroom as the theatre of his romantic drama!" sneered the baronet, whose face was black with suppressed rage. Then, turning to Laura Elmer, with a sarcastic bow, he said:

"I must again beg your pardon, Miss Elmer, for breaking in upon your very interesting little scene, and say, in apology for my indiscretion, that I would scarcely have expected to find the governess of the school so sentimentally employed."

And with a sardonic smile and bow he left the room.

Cassinove, with his dark eyes blazing with anger, started after him; but quick as lightning Laura Elmer sprang forward and caught his arm saying:

"Cassinove! Cassinove! Pause—control yourself!"

"He has insulted you! I must chastise him! I must and will! I would if he were the king!" exclaimed Cassinove, his whole countenance inflamed with indignation.

"No, no, Ferdinand, you will not, you must not. You will listen to me, and govern yourself. Remember that 'he who ruleth his own spirits is greater than he who taketh a city.' Anger is insensate, irrational. To yield to it is unworthy of a man. Keep your own soul in peace; let this insulting baronet go. What is he to us that we should permit him to disturb our repose? To-morrow we shall be clear of him; to-day let us forget him. Come, you will yield to me this time?"

He turned toward her, and his anger all melted away in a smile beaming with love, as he exclaimed:

"Yield to you, my love, my lady, my queen! Yield to you? Yes! you are my life, my soul, should you require it of me."

A little longer she detained him, to be sure that his indignation was entirely calmed, and then she dismissed him and summoned her pupils.

CHAPTER XXIV.

When the afternoon lessons were over, Laura Elmer drove to Chelsea, to inspect the lodgings on the second floor of Mrs. Russel's little cottage. She found the landlady and the lodgings all that Mr. Cassinove had represented them to be.

The cottage was situated in a quiet, clean street, and had the advantage of a fine, shady garden in the rear. The first floor was occupied with a neat little shop in front, and with the landlady's own apartments in the back. The second floor comprised a clean, airy parlor, with white window curtains in front, and as equally clean and airy little chamber, with white draperies, in the back.

Mrs. Russel was the same pleasing little lady that has already been described.

Miss Elmer was more than satisfied with the accommodations offered, and therefore she immediately engaged the apartments, promising to come and take possession in five days.

When Miss Elmer then mentioned that Mr. Cassinove had recommended the house and its tenantress, Mrs. Russel became enthusiastic in her expressions of gratitude for his character, and aspirations for his welfare. Miss Elmer was delighted with her landlady's sentiments, and in this pleasing frame of mind she took leave.

She returned to Lester House in time for a late tea, and without having a second opportunity of conversing with Cassinove, she retired to her chamber.

Laura went to bed and tried to read herself to sleep, vainly, for she could neither fix her attention to the volume in her hand, nor compose herself to rest.

The day had been too full of excitements. Ferdinand Cassinove, whom in her secret heart she had long adored, had declared his love, and she had made him happy by accepting the true heart that he had laid at her feet. They were betrothed. She felt that this assurance should have calmed her spirits, and she wondered why it did not, and why, on the contrary, her soul was oppressed with a gloom that she could not shake off, and haunted with a presentiment of evil which she could by no means exercise. It was true she knew Lady Lester and Sir Vincent Lester hated Cassinove with bitter animosity, but they could not hurt Cassinove, as well as herself, was to leave the house upon the next day, and need never come into collision with the Lesters again.

Thus it could not have been the thought of their animosity that filled her soul with a sense of approaching calamity, vague and terrible as the true event above through the valley of the shadow of death.

She had begun at two hours in a state of restlessness that could not be soothed. She heard the latest domestics, one by one, retire to their beds. And long after that, "in the dead waste and middle of the night," her nerves, sharpened by nervous excitement, heard the faintest sound in the empty street without or the silent house within it. At length all without and within was as still as death. Even her straining sense of hearing could not catch the faintest sound.

The dead silence and darkness was almost suffocating to her preternaturally excited nerves, and she felt as if she must have a sort of fearful expectancy.

It was while listening painfully through the deep silence, and gazing intently into the black darkness of her chamber, that a line of light appeared upon the wall, carried in the hall without, glided through the crevice at the bottom of her door, and disappeared in the body of her darkened chamber walls, and disappeared. At the same moment the faint stairs leading to the upper floor creaked slowly and softly as under the weight of some cautiously descending step.

Slight as this incident was, in the preternatural excitement of her nerves, it filled her with terror. It was in vain that she assured herself that there was nothing unnatural or alarming in the event, that the light and walker was merely some domestic passing through the house on some unusual errand at this hour. She could not be at rest; her heart stood still with horror! she listened breathless for some knell of doom. She heard it.

"Murder! murder! murder! murder!"

There was no mistaking those fearful shrieks that broke upon the silent midnight hour, and died away in gurgling inarticulation.

She unbarred her door and sprang out into the passage. Other doors were opening, other alarmed household, startled out of their deep slumbers, frantic cries, were now in motion, and all hurrying, half-dressed, and in wildest extremity of excitement, wonder and alarm, toward the chamber whence the cries proceeded. Ferdinand Cassinove, with attendants, Laura Elmer joined them, and the whole party poured into the chamber of Sir Vincent Lester.

There a scene met her view that seemed to congeal to ice every drop of her life-current.

Sir Vincent Lester lay wounded and dying in his bed, his heart's blood spouting in a thick jet from the wound in his side. With the convulsive grasp of the dying, he held Ferdinand Cassinove, who, pale, ghastly, and paralyzed with horror, and clutching a pontard in his hand, bent over the murdered man, without attempting to escape.

"In the name of Heaven, what is the meaning of this!" exclaimed the butler, while ejaculations of amazement burst from the men, and shrieks of horror from the women.

"He has murdered me! he, he, the wretch!" exclaimed the dying man, starting up and tightening his grasp upon the young man's collar, while, with the violence of the action, the blood spouted in torrents from his mortal wound.

And the next instant the convulsive grasp relaxed, the falling hand fell, and the dying planet dropped back upon his pillow—dead.

"For Heaven's sake run for a physician, Cassinove, or he will bleed to death!" exclaimed Ferdinand Cassinove, waking as it were from the spell of horror that had bound his senses.

Then seeing all eyes fixed upon him in loathing and detestation, and not understanding the meaning of their gaze, yet not willing that a moment should be lost that might be of vital interest to the victim, he exclaimed, earnestly:

"Hasten! fly! for Heanven's sake fly for a physician! A moment may save or long years may save a life!"

Perceiving that no one offered to obey, while all continued to glare upon him in detestation and horror, he said to the butler:

"Watson, look to your master! You have some experience. Apply restoratives vigorously, while I hasten myself to bring surgical help."

And he turned toward the door.

Here he was intercepted by the crowd of domestics, who, roused from their deep sleep by the murder, roughly barred his way with exclamations of:

"No, you don't, though!"

"You'd make a run, would you!"

"Don't you hope you may, you rascal!"

"Oh, won't you swing for it, though!"

"Hold on, you! Stay where you are, will you!"

"Don't let him get away! Seize holt on him, Jeemes!"

"Go for the perlice!"

The confusion was indescribable.

"Friends, what do you mean by hindering me? Let me pass. I must have a physician. I must have a physician. Don't you see that life and death hang upon every moment? Let me pass, I implore you, in the name of anxiety to save his enemy, if there should be yet a shadow of hope."

"Oh, yes, we know that your life or death hangs upon every instant, and you'll hang yourself presently! Don't you wish you may hear what he says about it," said James, the ladies' footman.

Watson, the butler, who had been anxiously examining the condition of the baronet, now left the bedside and stood among the fellow-servants, pale as death.

"A physician should instantly be summoned," again began Cassinove anxiously to say, when the butler gravely interrupted him.

"Mr. Cassinove, a physician can bring the dead to life, and my master, Sir Vincent Lester, is quite dead; but, for all that, I am ready for one. James, you go at once, and rouse up Dr. Clark, and tell him what has happened, and ask him to please to come at once. He will know what is best to be done, and how to tell my lady. And then, James, when you have told the doctor, go to Bow street and bring a pair of policemen. And mind, James, that you do not say one word to any one else as to what has occurred in this house until you are required to do so."

James was about to start upon his errand, when Cassinove starting forward, said:

"Send the footman at once to Bow street. I will go myself for the physician."

"No, you don't, though! no, you don't!" cried one of the servants, interrupting him.

"We should never see the sight of your face again if we were green enough to let you go!" exclaimed another, joining the opposition.

"What is the meaning of all this? Have I murdered you or of your senses?" inquired Cassinove, looking in amazement from one to another, and finally resting for abhorrence upon every face.

"I am afraid, Mr. Cassinove, that we must not let you leave the room," said the butler, gravely.

"What! am I to leave the room! What do you mean, fellow?" questioned Cassinove, indignantly.

"I am sorry, sir, we dare not do it," persisted the butler.

"Explain yourself!" peremptorily demanded Cassinove.

"The circumstances, sir! the circumstances!"

"What circumstances, fellow?"

"The circumstances we found you in when we burst into the room at the cry of murder, sir; our master dead, and dying, weltering in his blood; you standing over him with a dagger in your hand, and the butler, shuddering with horror at the recollection.

Cassinove's countenance turned ghastly white, reeled, and dropped into the nearest seat, overcome by the force of the circumstantial evidence against himself. Then recovering, with a mighty effort and wiping the drops of agony from his brow, he gasped forth the words:

"Send for a physician! I was going to fetch one myself when I heard the cry of murder from Sir Vincent's room. I sprang up, and rushed in at once; I was met in the hall, I thought a figure rushed past me in the opposite direction, but I hurried on, and was met at the door of Sir Vincent's room; I found him in the first spasm of the wound; I raised him in my arms, and drew out the poniard; he clutched me in his dying agony, and cried, a little weakly and inarticulately, 'Perwas him;' pursuing the direction of the poniard instead the young was filled with you all as it is to accuse me of this crime, and that you should be guilty of such gross injustice. Why, I am the betrothed husband of Miss Elmer, and you may be as you say, and may do you good with the magistrate, but the last words of my master were, 'Ferdinand Cassinove is the husband of my daughter.'

"Well, what were they? I was so overwhelmed with horror that I did not distinctly hear them."

"They accused you as his murderer, Mr. Cassinove!"

"Never! never!" cried Ferdinand Cassinove.

"Yes, sir; I am sorry to say they did. Think of it. Oh, it was horrible, sir! It chills my very blood to think of it now, to recollect the circumstances, sir. You were standing over him with the reeking dagger in your hand, his hand upon the collar in his dying grasp, and with his dying lips he said: 'His has murdered me—he, he, the wretch!'"

"But I was there to save him. He clutched me only in his mortal death-throes. His wild words referred only to the wretch who really did assassinate him, and rose to me," exclaimed Cassinove, in consternation at the increasing force of the fatal circumstantial evidence.

"It all sounds quite reasonable, Mr. Cassinove, sir, and I hope it may prove true; but that will be for his worship, the magistrate, to judge of, and not for me. Meantime, it is our duty to keep you here until the police come," replied the butler, gravely.

Cassinove turned his face with his hands, and sank groaning into his seat.

Scarcely a moment had he sat thus with his face buried in his hands when he felt a light touch upon his shoulder, and heard a low voice at his ear, murmuring softly:

"Take courage; you are guiltless, and your innocence will be made clear."

He looked up, and saw Laura Elmer, pale but firm, standing by his side.

CHAPTER XXV.

Cassinove was about to reply, but was interrupted by the hasty and agitated arrival of the family physician, and the return of the footman accompanied by the Bow street officers.

The circumstances of the discovery of the dreadful tragedy were required and detailed. The butler being the spokesman of the assembled household, related that they had been aroused from their sleep by cries of murder that were soon smothered and drowned; that they had been in alarm to Sir Vincent's chamber, whence the cries proceeded, and where they found their master wounded and dying, and clutching with his dying hand the collar of Ferdinand Cassinove, who stood over him, reeking dagger in hand, and accusing with his dying lips the same Ferdinand Cassinove of his murder.

The surgeon was then summoned, and accompanied by two magistrates, he hastened to the scene of the tragedy. After the most careful investigation of the circumstances, and a thorough sifting of the evidence, they brought in their verdict:

"Sir Vincent Lester came to his death on the morning of the 22nd of October, between two and three o'clock, by a wound inflicted with a dagger, in the left ventricle of the heart, by the hand of Ferdinand Cassinove."

And Ferdinand Cassinove was fully committed to Newgate upon the charge of willful murder.

A feeling of delicacy toward Laura Elmer, which had been present at the coroner's inquest, restrained him from asking to see her before he was taken away.

But Laura, in her distant chamber, had heard from the echoing halls of the servants' quarters the report and finding of the coroner's inquest; and she went down and waited in the hall until Cassinove was coming in custody of the officers. Then she went and gave him her hand, saying:

"Be comforted, Mr. Cassinove; I know that you are guiltless of this charge, and at the day of trial the world shall know it, too. I will employ all the faculties that God has given me in your service; and perhaps the mental acumen of a deeply interested woman may be more than equal to the experience of a detective policeman. I have strong hope."

"Miss Elmer, your unshaken confidence in me is, at this hour, my greatest earthly comfort and support. May God bless you!" replied Cassinove, with deep emotion.

"I will be with you again in the course of the day. The poor bereaved children of this house must be comforted and soothed as soon as they awake to the bitter consciousness of their loss. As soon as that duty is performed, I will visit and consult further with you, Goodby."

"Good-by! good-by! and may Heaven bless you for your goodness, Laura Elmer!"

And thus they parted—Cassinove to Newgate, in custody of the officers, and Laura back to the house of mourning.

It was near noon when Lady Lester's bell rang; and it was two hours later that the family physician sought her presence and carefully broke to her the news of her husband's death. Her shock was tremendous, and overwhelmed for the moment even her strong, masculine nature. Her attendants were summoned in haste to put their mistress to bed; and the utmost skill of the physician was taxed to assuage her nervous sufferings.

Laura Elmer waited to be of service; but almost the first intelligible words that Lady Lester spoke were:

"Has Miss Elmer gone?"

She was answered that Miss Elmer remained to see if she could be of any use in the present extreme distress of the family.

"Tell her so; beg her to go at once. I could not bear the sight of her, I am sure. It was all her doing; all her unprincipled coquetry. She flirted with Cassinove, and encouraged him to his crime, and played them off, one against the other, in the most infamous manner, until she succeeded in her evil purpose, as every one in the house could swear," said her ladyship, breaking into a paroxysm of rage and emotion.

Laura Elmer had, meantime, gently and tenderly informed the children of the sudden death of their father, withholding for the present the manner of his death; and the first burst of grief from them, their wild grief until the storm exhausted itself for the time; she had then soothed and quieted them, in the best manner she could, and left them quiet, in the care of their good nurse, Rosa.

Next, she went into the library, and wrote letters to Mr. Rathven Lester, who was then at Bath, and to other dear friends of the family, telling them merely of the sudden death of Sir Vincent Lester, and urging the need of their immediate presence in the house. She had dispatched those letters to the post, and was then engaged in writing a note, summoning the family solicitor, when the door opened, and Lady Clark entered, followed by her two sons, Lady Lester's nephews.

The feet work harder than any part of the body. They must walk long distances behind the plow or on fatiguing city pavements stand many tedious hours behind counter or before bench, or endure irksome confinement under desk or machine.

Do they deserve kind treatment? Yes! Do they get it? No! Man is kind to horses' feet—cruel to his own. He shoes his horse with skill and care to insure perfect comfort, but shoes himself with any old shoes—shoes that squeeze, pinch, deform and blister his feet.

If you want to be kind to your faithful, burden-bearing, hard-toiling feet, we'll tell you how. Call on the Foot-rite retailer in your town. His name's below. Don't be timid. You'll find his door swinging inward but never outward to find a welcome store. Let him fit you with a pair of Foot-rites. You'll find something unusual about their insides. You'll find your feet feeling almost as free, unconfined and comfortable as unshod feet. Why? Because Foot-rites are built with Easy Insides. And why have they Easy Insides? Ask the Foot-rite retailer. He'll explain how the Easy Insides are constructed—with supple Normal Calfskin in the upper and soft Cushion Insole. With wrinkleless uppers free from hard, stiff creases which rub and grind the foot's top surface with every step—with insides that soothe instead of irritate—with insides that's the precise shape of your foot, due to the Foot-sculptured Last over which the inside was molded. And with a lot of other easy inside devices such as Toe-Freedom Uncollapsable Box Toes, Heel-Comforting Counters, Hurtless Instep Seams, Ivory-like Insoles, and "Won't Blister" Hooks and Eyes.

Foot-rite Easy Insides deserve the name of Kind Insides. You'll be for them strong after a few days' wear.

all that she was able to do for the assistance of the distressed family, and much also that others in the excitement of the day had forgotten or neglected to perform, was really not sorry to be set at liberty.

"Shall I go and take leave of her ladyship?" inquired Laura.

"No, I think not, Miss Elmer; Lady Lester is sleeping under the influence of a powerful narcotic, and must not be disturbed for hours," said the doctor, who in no degree credited the charges of her ladyship against the noble-looking girl before him.

"Then I will leave with you my adieu to Lady Lester, and beg you to assure her of my deep sympathy," said Laura.

"I will not fail to do so, or to let her ladyship know how much we are all indebted to your self-possession, your thought and activity in the present distressing crisis. You have thought of everything that was forgotten, and done everything that was neglected by others."

"I have done only what I felt constrained to do under the circumstances, and if there is anything else in which I can be of use, I hope you will let me know."

"Certainly, Miss Elmer; you are exceedingly kind and disinterested in the assistance you have given this afflicted family, especially when your private griefs and anxieties must have pressed heavily upon your mind and heart," said the doctor, kindly.

At this first word of sympathy Laura's fine eyes filled with tears.

"You do not believe Ferdinand Cassinove to be guilty?" she said.

"No, no, on my soul and honor, no; I have observed the young man ever since he has been in the family; it is impossible he could have been guilty of such a crime."

"The Lord in heaven bless you for these words."

"But, oh! I fear it will be difficult to make a judge and jury believe as we do," said Laura, involuntarily wringing her hands over each other in the extremity of her distress.

"We must trust in God, employ the most cunning detective to trace out the real criminal, and engage the best counsel for the defense of the supposed one."

"We—do you say we? Oh, Dr. Clark, am I to understand that you honor me thus an entirety with us, and that you will assist us with your greater experience and advice?" asked Laura, clasping her hands and looking imploringly into the good physician's venerable face.

"Yes, my child, yes; not only with my advice, but with my purse and my active assistance. I consider it a duty, also not only to the cause of humanity, but to the cause of justice, and not only to the wrongfully-accused prisoner, but to my deceased friend, to try to discover the real murderer."

"Heaven bless you, Dr. Clark, for the generous words! Even now you exclaimed Laura Elmer, fervently.

"You are going, I heard you say, to visit Ferdinand Cassinove in prison?"

"Yes; he has neither mother nor sister in the world; he has no relative on earth but me, and I will be to him all his promised wife, and I must go to him, let the land world say what it will. I am going to-day."

"You are quite right, my dear; but Newgate is not exactly the place for a young lady to visit for the first time. You must let me take you there, my dear, and make you known to the prisoner, after which you will be able to repeat your visit without the fear of rudeness from the officials. I shall be at liberty to attend you at four o'clock this afternoon. In the meantime, my dear, you had better, for your own comfort, see to your removal. Have you secured lodgings?"

"Yes, Dr. Clark; my good friend, with a friend of Mr. Cassinove's, at Chelsea."

"Then send your luggage on at once and come to your lodgings. There, at four o'clock, I will take you to Newgate, and then we can see and consult with this much-injured young man, and afterward I can set you down at your own door. Good-by," said the venerable physician, as, with an encouraging pressure of her hand, he left Laura Elmer.

Laura Elmer dispatched the note that she had been writing to the family solicitor, and then repaired to her room, packed and sent off her boxes, with a brief note, to Mrs. Russel, saying only that she would be with her later in the afternoon.

Miss Elmer considerately refrained from visiting the spirits of the distressed children, by taking a formal leave of them, and contented herself by sending the nurse an affectionate message for the little girls.

Punctually at four o'clock the doctor's carriage was at the door, and Laura, accompanied by her kind old friend, departed for that old abode of sin and sorrow, Newgate.

A half-hour's ride brought them to the gloomy prison.

Dr. Clark took Miss Elmer first into the apartments of the governor, to whom he made some communication and then left his protege civility and attention in her future visits to the prison.

Then, attended by an officer, they went to the cell in which Ferdinand Cassinove was confined.

The young man received them calmly and even cheerfully; thanking Dr. Clark for his attention in escorting Laura Elmer to the prison, and silently blessing his betrothed with a most eloquent glance for the comfort and strength in coming to visit him. He had recovered from the first stunning effect of his arrest and imprisonment upon the heinous charge of murder, and was prepared to take a calm view of his position and prospects. He offered the only chair in his cell to Miss Elmer and invited Dr. Clark to sit beside him on the cot bedstead. Then the three entered into conversation upon the best course to be pursued for his defense. Laura again repeated to his friends all the circumstances of his presence in the bedchamber of Sir Vincent immediately after the murder. The doctor advised him to reduce that statement carefully to writing, and to put it into the hands of his counsel. He then informed the young man of the determination that Miss Elmer and himself had come to, namely, to employ the most cunning detectives in searching for the discovery of the murderer, and engaging the most eminent counsel in defending the case of the prisoner. And that he should take this step not only in respect to humanity and justice endangered in the person of his young friend, but in regard to old friendships in that of his deceased patron.

Cassinove thanked him with deep emotion. They remained consulting with, encouraging and comforting the prisoner, until the hour arrived at which the prison doors were to be closed for the night, and then, with the promise to send an eminent lawyer to see the prisoner in the morning, and to visit him every day, the good doctor took his leave, and brought Miss Elmer away.

And in another hour he set her down at Daisy Cottage, Hay lane, Chelsea.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The sun was setting when Laura Elmer alighted from the doctor's carriage, bade him good-afternoon, and entered the little gate leading up a shaded walk to the door of the cottage. Laura, on the head of Hay lane, where Mrs. Russel kept her little shop, and her neat lodgings.

Miss Elmer did not know whether Mrs. Russel had as yet heard of the tragedy at Lester House, and its consequences to their mutual friend, and she almost dreaded to meet the landlady.

The door in answer to her knock, Miss Elmer saw that she knew the worst. The poor little woman's eyes were red and swollen with tears, and her first words were:

"Oh, Miss Elmer! Oh, Miss Elmer, what shall I do?"

"Trust in God and do all that we can," replied Laura, in a low voice, as she pressed the hand that was held out to her.

"Oh, you say that, Miss Elmer, but you do not know all the poor young gentleman was to me and my children, or you could not speak so calmly. He was almost our only friend; he would, and, indeed, he did, divide his last sovereign with us. I loved him like a brother," sobbed the poor woman, speaking of Cassinove in the past tense, as one already dead.

"But hope is left yet," said Laura. "I have a very slight clew that may bring to light something to clear Mr. Cassinove and convict the guilty."

And Laura related to Mrs. Russel the events at Lester House connected with the mysterious inmate, Helen Ravenscroft, and the stranger who dogged her carriage in the park, dwelling especially upon the extreme agitation and the inexplicable words of Sir Vincent's secretive his protege civility and attention in her future visits to the prison.

Then, attended by an officer, they went to the cell in which Ferdinand Cassinove was confined.

The young man received them calmly and even cheerfully; thanking Dr. Clark for his attention in escorting Laura Elmer to the prison, and silently blessing his betrothed with a most eloquent glance for the comfort and strength in coming to visit him. He had recovered from the first stunning effect of his arrest and imprisonment upon the heinous charge of murder, and was prepared to take a calm view of his position and prospects. He offered the only chair in his cell to Miss Elmer and invited Dr. Clark to sit beside him on the cot bedstead. Then the three entered into conversation upon the best course to be pursued for his defense. Laura again repeated to his friends all the circumstances of his presence in the bedchamber of Sir Vincent immediately after the murder. The doctor advised him to reduce that statement carefully to writing, and to put it into the hands of his counsel. He then informed the young man of the determination that Miss Elmer and himself had come to, namely, to employ the most cunning detectives in searching for the discovery of the murderer, and engaging the most eminent counsel in defending the case of the prisoner. And that he should take this step not only in respect to humanity and justice endangered in the person of his young friend, but in regard to old friendships in that of his deceased patron.

Cassinove thanked him with deep emotion. They remained consulting with, encouraging and comforting the prisoner, until the hour arrived at which the prison doors were to be closed for the night, and then, with the promise to send an eminent lawyer to see the prisoner in the morning, and to visit him every day, the good doctor took his leave, and brought Miss Elmer away.

And in another hour he set her down at Daisy Cottage, Hay lane, Chelsea.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The sun was setting when Laura Elmer alighted from the doctor's carriage, bade him good-afternoon, and entered the little gate leading up a shaded walk to the door of the cottage,

PRESENTATION.

The employees of Madill Bros. met in the store on Wednesday evening, and presented Mr. J. F. Moore, the genial window trimmer, with the following address and a beautiful gold chain pen, suitably engraved, prior to his departure for Peterboro', where he has gone to fill a similar position.

Napanee, Nov. 14th, '06.

Mr. J. F. Moore,

Napanee.

Dear Sir,—We, your fellow employees of Madill Bros., regret your departure from us. Though our acquaintance has been of a little over two short months, we have learned, through short business relations, your better qualities of character, and appreciate in you your high qualifications in your chosen occupation of life.

We all feel that the greatest success in your new field, and congratulate you upon your promotion, to the post of a partner in a well established business in life was fulfilled early. Within, as you the "Waterman Pen" knowing that the pen is mightier than the sword," and hope that it may be, in some one way, the means of helping you on to yet higher attainments.

Signed on behalf of the employees,

A. J. GLEESON,
M. E. CLARKIN.

BETTER HORSES.

There was a fairly good attendance at the Council Chamber on Saturday night, to discuss the horse industry of this district, and the province at large. Mr. Sinkler, the government representative for Lennox present, and stated the object of the meeting, the government being desirous of legislation for the improvement of this important industry, provided the farmers and horse owners expressed their willingness. Mr. J. E. Rogers presided, and after a good deal of discussion, three motions were put, one by Messrs. R. Washburn and Jas. Chambers, that in case the government decided to license only pure bred stallions, owners of horses not fulfilling the requirements be remunerated for what they were worth.

A motion by Messrs. Donald Ham and J. Powell, that no action be taken as to licensing horses, was lost.

A motion by Messrs. G. H. Williams and Dempsey Brown, that this meeting would recommend legislation in regard to licensing only pure bred stallions of the Clydesdale, Shire, Standard bred conformation to be considered, and subject to inspection, was carried with but one opposing vote.

The committee are moving in the right direction, and we understand the feeling throughout this section of Ontario is strongly in favor of some legislation that will eliminate the scrub sire.

TO AID KINGSTON HOSPITAL.

If workers and enthusiasm are criterions of success, the Bowling field last Friday afternoon, to organize a branch of the Kingston Hospital society in connection with the General Hospital, Kingston, there was little room to doubt the result. Dr. Symington was in the chair, and introduced Mr. Cornell, President of the Kingston Auxiliary, who in a graphic yet earnest manner explained the object of the meeting in touch with the work of the hospital and the indebtility of the meeting a branch here. She then gave a report of the work done last year, the money raised and how it had been expended. She also expressed the gratitude to Mrs. Connell for the way in which she had worked for the cause, and needed to form an Auxiliary. The officers elected were:

President—Mrs. R. A. Leonard.
1st Vice Pres.—Mrs. Wm. Templeton.
2d Vice Pres.—Mrs. C. D. Wartman.
3d Vice Pres.—Mrs. W. T. Gilmore.
Recording Secretary—Mrs. M. S. Mikel.
Corresponding Secretary — Mrs. Orr.
Treasurer—Mrs. F. S. Richardson.
Buyers—Dr. Symington and Mrs. Edward Williams.

The membership fee was placed at the nominal sum of fifty cents, to secure the ladies of our town will appreciate this a worthy object. Enroll themselves as members of the Auxiliary. About forty names were already been handed in.

Files quickly and positively cured with Dr. Bloop's Magic Ointment. It's a wonderful Piles discovered it that will work surely and with satisfaction. Itching, blind, bleeding and protruding Piles disappear like magic by its use. Relief is felt at once. 50 cents in nickel capped glass jars. Druggists sent. Sold and recommended by T. H. Wallace.

REV. F. B. STRATTON,

Kingston Whig.

After an illness extending close upon two months, Rev. F. B. Stratton passed away on Thursday night, 8th Nov., at his home, 464 Albert street. The news of his death was learned with sincere regret, as for many years Mr. Stratton had been prominent in the ranks of the Methodist ministry in this district. He was sixty-six years of age, and was superannuated in the year 1902, and at that time moved to Belleville. He lived there until last spring, when he returned home in Kingston, and moved here. It was on September 11th last that he was about to leave to attend the meeting of the general conference at Montreal, that Mr. Stratton was stricken with illness, in fact he was taken ill just a few hours before the train set for his departure. He was removed to the hospital, and remained there for five weeks.

IN MEMORIAM.

Scranton, Pa., Tribune.

It seems fitting there should be a few words said in loving remembrance of the late Mrs. Lawrence Fowler.

Seldom has a community been stirred to its depths as has been by the sudden passing away of Mrs. Fowler last Saturday morning.

Not quite two years in our midst, who came as a happy bride, she soon endeared herself to all in her sphere. Many of her sweet relations, to she wrought so well that her mission in life was fulfilled early. Within so brave, courageous, uncomplaining when "best" by pain, and remained to the best sense of the word, a helpmeet to her husband whose heart is sorely trusted in her. May the God of love sustain him in this bitter trial and all so sorely bereft by her going.

FREE TRIP TO KINGSTON.

As a special inducement to Napanee people to visit Kingston, it is the aggree to pay the railroad fare from here to Kingston and return to all purchasers of $15.00 and upwards in Steacy's store entered. This is one of the ideas is to encourage personal shopping by the people, and to give them the privileges as city people. We mark all our goods in plain figures, so the chance of misunderstanding. Our name and reputation have been established with high grade furs for nearly thirty years, and the fact that our furs are largely made in our own city of Kingston where buyers are so critical, is enough in itself to prove that careful buyers have found that they can get their furs here to as good advantage as elsewhere. It's hardly necessary to tell you that early choosers get the best—it this regard, "a word to the wise is sufficient."

Now our fur catalogue is ready and will be mailed free to any address. Note carefully our name and address and don't confuse us with another firm of a similar name doing business further up the street. GEORGE MILLS & CO., 106-108 Princess St., Kingston, Ont.

PUBLIC LIBRARY.

How many of our citizens are continuing to do their duty towards the Public Library? When the building was opened there were many liberal responses to the appeal for help, but many have done nothing since, feeling perhaps that the duty was done when they subscribed toward the building fund.

No doubt a great many are willing to help, but have, like many others, had little never occurred to them that the Library was in need of help. There are many paying $1.00 a year membership and a few subscribing $5.00, and ought to pay more than the annual fee that is charged. We have never intended that the dollar fee was to be a limitation to the privilege of belonging to the Library. Many of the readers are members on a private enterprise, the minimum fee would at the least be $5.00, and there are those who cannot get $5.00 worth of reading out of the Library, and who would gladly make book home with him.

There are many to whom $1.00 means considerable and in order to bring the Library within the reach of all that nominal fee for membership is charged.

The Board is in need of money at present to buy new books which are much in demand, and to keep the Library up to the standard of efficiency it should be. Many of the books are badly worn and should be replaced by new ones. Others should be rebound and the other expenses increased.

The Board desire to make the library as useful as possible, perhaps some services free, and have only one object in view and that is to do the best possible with the means at their disposal. Their means are at present limited and they are appealing to the individual citizen for help. Some have done their duty, and make a personal canvass, but the simple suggestion is made that there is a need of help, should bring forth all the assistance that is required. Those many who are paying only $1.00 for membership could well afford to make it double that fee. How many there are who would be willing to assist a poor neighbor or a friend by presenting them with a Library membership ticket. There is scarcely a servant girl in town but would appreciate one of the privileges of the Library and be glad to go and exchange a book for another every night. Present them with membership tickets and you benefit them feel that they have a right to go in and look over the books and select their reading. Try a book home with them if they wish to do so.

Let the citizens bear in mind that in helping the Library they are helping themselves. It belongs to the people, and the people should cheerfully assist in its maintenance.

NEWBURGH.

The Epworth League held a very interesting literary in the basement of the church on Monday evening. The feature was a debate, "Resolved that a monarchy is preferable to a republic." The affirmative was led by Ray Farley and he was ably assisted by Miss Pearl Patterson and Mr. George Paul. Mr. Percy Nesbit led the negative and had two able supporters in the persons of Miss Ruth Patterson and Miss Jennie Brandon. The debate was very close and the judges, Miss Baker, Rev. Reddick and Rev. J. F. Moore gave their decision to the affirmative. The chorus, a duet by Mrs. Mason and Mrs. Thomson, and a solo by Miss Bleta Scriver, composed the musical part. At the close of the debate, Miss Young, the 23 Vice President of the League, and organist of the church, was called to the front, when Mr. Paul read an address on behalf of the church, expressive of the congregation's appreciation of Miss Young's valuable services. Miss Brandon presented her with a handsome silver spoon. Miss Young has tendered her resignation as organist of the church and has handed it in her last here. She leaves shortly for Toronto.

SELLS MORE OF CHAMBERLAIN'S COUGH REMEDY THAN OF ALL OTHERS PUT TOGETHER.

Mr. Wesley Hall, druggist, of Mt. Hope, Ont., writes: "I have sold Chamberlain's Cough Remedy for several years and have never had anything to take its place. It is the best remedy for coughs, colds and croup that I have ever handled. I sell as much of it as of all other lines I have in my shelves put together. Of the many hundreds of bottles which I have sold, I have not had one bottle returned. I can personally recommend this medicine and to have used it myself and given it to my children and always with the best results." For sale at The Red Cross Drug Store. 46tf

PRESENTATION.

The employees of Madill Bros. met in the store on Wednesday evening, and presented Mr. F. Moore, the general window trimmer, with the following address and a beautiful gold watch fob, suitably engraved, prior to his departure for Peterboro', where he has gone to fill a similar position.

Napanee, Nov. 14th, '06.

Mr. J. F. Moore,
Napanee.

Dear Sir,—We, your fellow employees of Madill Bros., regret your departure from us. Though our acquaintance has been of a little over two short years, we have learned, through close business relations, your better qualities of a personal nature, as well as high qualifications in your chosen occupation of life.

We all wish you the greatest success in your new field, and congratulate you upon your promotion to that of a partner in a well established business.

We take pleasure in presenting to you this "Waterman Pen" knowing that the pen is mightier than the sword," and hope that it may be, in some small way, the means of helping you on to yet higher attainments.

Signed on behalf of the employees,

A. J. GLEESON,
M. E. CLARKIN.

BETTER HORSES.

There was a fairly good attendance at the Council Chamber on Friday night, to discuss the horse industry of Napanee and the province in general. Mr. Sinkler, the government representative, was present, and stated the object of the meeting, the government being desirous to give legislation for the improvement of this important industry, providing the farmers and horse owners only expressed their willingness. Mr. F. C. Bogart presided, and after a good deal of discussion, three motions were put, one by Messrs. R. VanLuven and Thos. Chambers, that the meeting recommend decided to license only pure bred stallions, owners of horses to be the filling the requirements be remunerated for their loss, was carried.

A motion by Messrs. Donald Ham and J. Powell, that no action be taken as to licensing horses, was lost.

A motion by Messrs. G. H. Williams and Dempsey Brown, that this meeting would recommend legislation in licensing only pure bred stallions of the different breeds considered, and such information to be considered, and submitted to the Ontario Department of Inspection, was carried by a large majority, but one opposing vote.

The farmers are moving in the right direction, and we understand the feeling throughout this section of Ontario is strongly in favor of such legislation that will eliminate the scrub horse.

TO AID KINGSTON HOSPITAL.

If workers and enthusiasm are criterions of success, the meeting held last Friday afternoon, to organize the ladies of the city and district in connection with the General Hospital, Kingston, was all that could be desired. Dr. Symington was called to the chair and introduced Mrs. Gemmell, president of the Kingston Auxiliary, who in a gracious yet earnest manner explained the aims of the hospital in touch with the work of the hospital and the advisability of forming a branch here. She then gave a statement of the good done last year, the money raised and how it had been expended. The ladies expressed their gratitude to Mrs. Gemmell for the way she had presented the subject, and proceeded to form an Auxiliary. The officers elected were:

President—Mrs. R. A. Leonard.
1st Vice Pres.—Mrs. W. D. Herrington.
2d Vice Pres.—Mrs. C. D. Wartman.
3d Vice Pres.—Mrs. W. T. Gilmour.
Recording Secretary—Mrs. M. S. Mowat.
Corresponding Secretary — Mrs. Orr.
Treasurer—Mrs. F. S. Richardson.
Buyer—Dr. Symington and Mrs. Edward Wallbridge.

The membership fee was placed at $1.00 per annum, and the ladies will see to it that every one of our town will become a member. The following enrolled themselves as members of the Auxiliary. About forty names have already been handed in.

REV. F. B. STRATTON,
Kingston Whig.

After an illness extending close upon two months, the Rev. F. B. Stratton preached away on Thursday night, 8th Nov., at his home, 464 Albert street. The news of his death was learned with deep regret, as for many years Mr. Stratton had been one of the most active workers of the Methodist ministry in this district. He was sixty-seven years of age, and was superannuated in the year 1902, and since that time has resided in Belleville. He lived there until last spring, when he moved to Kingston, where he and moved here. It was on September 17th, 1905, that he was stricken down with illness, in fact he was taken ill just a few hours after the opening of the general conference, at Montreal, that Mr. Stratton was afflicted

Dr. Hugo's Health Tablets
for Women
Make Healthy Women.

Whether you believe it or not, this incontrovertible fact remains. These tablets will change weak and diseased organs into strong, healthy organs; fast with some, more slowly with others, but surely and absolutely certain with all who persist in their use, except in the few beyond the help of medicine.

Disease, even chronic, will then disappear as these organs are restored to their normal conditions.

These tablets are now recognized by medical men as the best adapted to the special needs of women.

weeks, afterward being taken to his home. During last summer, it will be remembered, Mr. Stratton was pastor of the Sydenham Street Methodist church, during the illness of the pastor, Rev. C. E. Manning. A remarkable coincidence in the last time he preached his last sermon at Napanee, near where he was born, and where he spent his boyhood days.

He is survived by his wife and six daughters, Mrs. T. E. Curnoe, Kingston; Mrs. Bell Williamson, Hindon; Mrs. R. H. Bennett, Pall River, Mass.; Mrs. A. J. Bowden, Rock Island, Ill.; Mrs. W. J. Armstrong, Detroit, and Mrs. Freda Stratton, Detroit. Deceased was one of a family of eleven, and the last survivor of the family in the state of Michigan, is now the only surviving brother.

The late Rev. Mr. Stratton was born in the township of Richmond, four miles west of Napanee, in the year 1838. His father was an American, who came to Canada from Massachusetts, in the early part of the century. His mother was of Irish descent, though born near Napanee. During his boyhood days he had very few advantages. Up to ten years of age he attended the district school, as the duties of farm life would allow, but after that, owing to the continued illness of his father, he was obliged to go at hard work. He had a strong desire for knowledge, however, and this led him to seek every opportunity for learning. At the age of eighteen he secured six months at the common school, and then he entered the teaching profession. He continued in this work for four years, with perfect satisfaction to the people and to his own advancement. He spent two years at Albert College, Belleville, and showed great ability as a student, leaving all the classes. However, to his own regret and that of his professors, he was compelled to relinquish his studies in order to secure more means. He obtained fees for ten more years, when he received a pressing call from the church, and his ministerial life began.

Rev. Mr. Stratton's religious life commenced in 1854, though from early years he was an earnest worker in the church and the Sabbath School, being the son of a Baptist deacon. He first joined the church his choice, Methodist church his choice, Methodist church in that year. He was selected as an exhorter, which he continued until he entered the ministry in 1860. He was sent to take charge of a mission, being also appointed to assist in the duties of a missionary, to carry on his studies for ordination. At the same time he was regularly ordained. He was married in succession to the following fields: Hinchinbrook, Osnabrook, Lyn, Brockville, Smithville, Hallowell, Picton, Morven, Otesan, Orono, Stirling, Madoc and Tweed, in which pastorate he was generally beloved. He was a lover of social life, and was of a genial disposition, which helped on the advancement of religion. As the pulpit he was an able exponent of the truth. He was always original in his discourse. He was regarded as one of the best preachers in the district. He was secretary of his annual conference for four consecutive years, and had been a delegate to conferences ever since his sixth year in the ministry. He was a member of the college board several years, member of various committees, and for the first united general conference, and his district chairman for six years. He had great success as a revivalist. Rev. Mr. Stratton was president of the Bay of Quinte conference in the year 1896. He was stationed at Napanee, and was superannuated were Trenton, Bethel and Napanee. Mr. Stratton was a member of the Masonic fraternity, and was a Past Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge of Canada in Ontario.

AS IT SHOULD BE.

Toronto Daily News.

At the celebration of Rev. Dr. McMullen's jubilee in Woodstock, Inst., Father Coyle, of St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church, had a seat on the platform, and was one of the speakers. In the course of his address Father Cook said that Dr. McMullen had preached the broad doctrine of Protestant and the spirit of Christ. "We hope that as the Lord has blessed him in the ministry he will bless him now; when he goes to his fathers, may his departure be a glorious sunset. His life has been a grand example for all to follow, and his life has been a benediction. He has labored with an eye single to the Master's service." This was a generous tribute to a Protestant minister, and expresses exactly the attitude that ought to prevail between the clergy of the Catholic and Protestant Churches. The estrangement which generally marks the relationship of the two bodies discredits the Christian spirit, and is almost a denial of the Christian faith. It is nothing more than a scandal that Protestant and Roman Catholic children in Ontario receive a system of religious teaching for the Public Schools, and thus keep alive the tide of sectarianism which is fed by the differences between the Churches.

IMPROVED machinery will not, of itself, produce good flour.

You may be an excellent cook, but you cannot produce light, wholesome baking unless the flour you use be the kind that permits such results.

So in the milling; machinery alone cannot produce

Royal Household Flour

out of the wrong kind of wheat any more than you can make the right kind of bread or pastry out of the wrong kind of flour.

Ogilvie's Royal Household Flour is made from hard spring wheat—wheat that is rich in nutriment, that grinds fine and white, and produces bread and pastry that are wholesome and nourishing as well as light and crisp—it's a flour that begins to be good in the wheat fields, not in the mills.

Your grocer prefers to sell you Ogilvie's Royal Household Flour because he knows the value of a pleased customer.

SAYS PRINCE RUPERT IS SPLENDID HARBOR

Inspector of Agencies Bredt Returns From Northern Trip.

P. M. Bredt, of Regina, Dominion government inspector of agencies and foreign colonies, accompanied by Mrs. Bredt, arrived in Victoria yesterday after attending the New Westminster fair.

In the fall of last year Mr. Bredt visited the coast for the benefit of his health impaired by too close application to the arduous duties of his office and made his headquarters in Victoria. The balmy climate of this Island had its customary effect and in a few weeks Mr. Bredt was sufficiently recovered to make many excursions about the Island taking notes of its conditions and advantages; and among other functions, he attended the Cowichan Agricultural exhibition at Duncans, where he tested as one of the judges, afterwards taking a sea trip up the west coast as far as Fort Simpson.

"My opinion of Victoria and its surroundings," said Mr. Bredt, "is sufficiently expressed by the fact that I have taken the earliest opportunity of coming back again to spend my summer holiday with you and that I have brought Mrs. Bredt this time to share my enjoyment. I have this year repeated my west coast trip, this time extending it as far as Skagway. It is certainly the most picturesque country one could imagine. We were delighted and surprised in so far as Skagway. It is several Norways in one wonderful panorama. Among many other changes for the better that I noticed was that of the improved conditions of travel. The boat in which we made the trip was commodious and comfortable, luxuriously fitted with the latest improvements with the additional recommendation of good cuisine and attendance, a good seaboat, a genial commander and pleasant and capable officers."

ENJOYED THE TRIP IMMENSELY

and were fortunate enough to have as fellow passengers, President Hayes, of the Grand Trunk Pacific railroad. We had thus the chance to visit Prince Rupert. In my opinion it is an ideal location for the terminus and the harbor is unsurpassed on the coast. At present the hydrographic survey is still incomplete and mariners enter for the first time with natural caution but since having made the entrance I can say that they would have no fear about entering at any time. While we were there the weather was very stormy with a nasty sea running outside. Inside, however, it was perfectly calm, the position being well protected from the prevailing winds.

"Certainly," continued Mr. Bredt, there is room—there for a great city and Digby island would make an ideal suburb or summer resort. Communication would have to be by ferry I think, though the dividing passage is narrow and the distance short; not greater than between North Vancouver and Vancouver city, if so far; it would be practically a part of the city.

"There is plenty of activity in evidence at Prince Rupert; houses for the engineers are being rapidly constructed, and gangs of men are busy clearing land for the township. Already there is a very serviceable wharf which they intend to extend immediately and everything seems to point to quick development."

The Signs of Heart Trouble

You can Surely Secure Heart, Health and Strength through Dr. Shoop's Restorative.

Heart weakness which can be dealt with at all is nerve weakness. Just as your hand trembles when its nerves are weak, when your heart nerves are weak your heart flutters and palpitates. Other signs are shortness of breath after slight exercise; fainting spells; pain or tenderness about the heart caused by irregular heart action; choking sense. Also as if the heart was in the throat; uneasy sensation in the chest, showing that the heart isn't working right; pain when you lie on one side—usually the left; and difficult breathing; smothered feeling. There is absolutely only one way to treat a weak heart. That is to brinpback permanent nerve strength to its nerves. Can you imagine how anything else can be done? Dr. Shoop's Restorative will bring back the strength to the heart nerves always. There is nothing in this remedy to stimulate; nothing that leads to reaction. The strength that it gives is natural and permanent. It is just the same strength as Nature gives to those who are well. Dr. Shoop's Restorative (Tablets or Liquid) creates strength, which extends over the whole muscle nerve system—it overcomes the cause of the trouble as well as the result. Sold by T. B. WALLACE.

The Bridal Eve

"He was a fugitive from justice?"

"Yes, yes! Oh, it is very cruel to say so!"

"No, it is only just. His name, then, is Russel?"

"Oh, no!"

"What! Then you do not go by his name?"

"No, no! I would not, after—after he fled!"

"Why not?"

"It would have ruined me! I took my maiden name, and moved into another neighborhood where I was not known. I dressed in widow's weeds because it seemed more quiet and respectable for a lone young mother struggling through the world! God forgive me, I did not mean to act a falsehood!"

"What was the nature of this crime which was so heinous as to compel the innocent wife of the criminal to change her name and place of residence to escape reflected ruin?"

"Oh, do not ask me! Do not! do not!" cried poor Mrs. Russel, while shudders of horror convulsed her fragile form.

"It could have been no ordinary crime! The unfortunate wives of homicides are not obliged to change their names and neighborhoods. Well, I will not insist upon the nature of the man's offence against society. But in the name and for the sake of stern justice, I must have his real name!"

"Oh! to tell you that will be to tell you all!" cried the poor woman, in an agony of distress.

"I abjure you, Mrs. Russel, in the sacred cause of justice, tell me the name of that man!"

"Oh! oh! stoop, then! Stoop close then! I cannot bear to speak it aloud —looking in your face, with your eyes upon me!"

Laura Elmer stooped her ear close to the woman's lips, saying:

"Courage! It is but a word!"

Mrs. Russel shivered through all her frame, as she whispered:

"It was——"

The last word, the fatal name, was audible only to Laura Elmer, who suddenly dropped the hands of the woman, and, appalled by horror, sank into the nearest seat.

And no word was spoken between them for some minutes. At last:

"Heaven have mercy on you, most miserable of women!" said Miss Elmer.

And rising, she went and took and pressed her hands, saying:

"Pardon me if I have deeply probed your sorely wounded heart, and believe me I will deal as tenderly by your feelings as I can in justice to another."

"I know it, Miss Elmer! I know it! You are perfectly right! You could consider me in the slightest degree. Go on, and let justice be done, though the heavens fall!"

And longer the friends talked; but the dreaded name was not again mentioned between them. Then the children, who had been sent out into the garden to play, now came in, and the confidential conversation was interrupted.

Mrs. Russel showed her lodger up into her private apartments, where fires had been lighted, and her luggage conveyed, and bade her good-night at the bedroom door.

Laura entered the neat and quiet chamber, where the snow-white curtains of the window and the bed, and the clean hearth and bright fire, diffused an air of purity and cheerfulness through the scene.

She could not sleep; but drawing an easy-chair beside the little table before the fire, she fell into deep and severe thought upon the subject of the probable assassin of the baronet.

Painfully and intensely as she thought, she was still, as it were, extremely conscious of the sounds without. She heard Ruth Russel and her children moving about; she heard the murmuring of their evening prayers at their mother's knee; she heard that poor mother take them into the little chamber adjoining the best parlor to sleep; and the muffled shuffling with which the little ones got to bed; next she heard Miss Elmer return to the back parlor, and settle herself in her seat, probably to sew for hours—for every sound was audible all over that small house. At last all was perfectly quiet, nothing breaking the silence except the hourly striking of the old-fashioned clock in the passage below. Laura sat intently thinking as the hours slowly passed. The clock struck twelve, and still she sat and thought; one, and still she never changed her attitude; two, and she had not even once looked up, or remembered that it was at that witching hour on the preceding night that the awful deed of murder had rung through Lester House, appalling the inmates, arousing the sleepers. She was still buried in thought between two and three o'clock, when she was startled by the sound of a step heard in the deep silence, coming up the walk from the little gate to the cottage door. Everything alarmed her now; she listened and heard a light, cautious tapping at the cottage door, and heard the landlady go to the door, and ask in a low, trembling voice:

"Who's there? What do you want?"

"It is I, Ruth, and I want to come in," answered a low voice without.

"Oh, my Lord in heaven, have pity on us! What has come over here?" inquired the poor woman, in a low, suffocating voice.

"Because I am dying to see you and the children, Ruth. Think what a long exile I have had from you both, my dear."

"Oh, where do you come from, and why do you come, knowing the danger?"

"I come from abroad, because I could not longer live away from you all. I have been but a few hours in London, and have only within the last hour discovered your residence."

"But the danger! the danger of returning!"

"Pish! my dear, I am forgotten; besides the 'danger' is very much modified by an event that has occurred within the last twenty-four hours. But all this time you are keeping me out in the cold. Come, let me in, there's a duck."

"Oh, heaven of heavens, to what straits I am reduced!" again complained the poor woman.

A Midsummer Query.

Do you feel fit and up to the mark? If not there must be a reason why. Probably owing to the depressing effects of the warm weather, you are not taking the usual quantity of nourishing food, although the system requires quite as much nourishment in hot weather as in cold. To overcome the difficulty you should use a concentrated, palatable and easily digested food. This description fits to a nicety.

When the system is run down, appetite failing, weight decreasing and nerve tone depressed, there is nothing like FERROL to restore normal and healthy conditions. Unlike other concentrated preparations FERROL can be taken in summer as well as at any other season; it never causes nausea or other gastric disturbances.

FERROL is not a patent mystery. The formula is freely published. It is prescribed by the best Physicians. It is endorsed by the most eminent Medical Journals. It is used in prominent Hospitals, Sanitariums, etc.

"Come, come, Ruth, this is a very cold reception. Unbar the door, there's a darling."

Sobbing bitterly, Mrs. Russel unbarred the door, and admitted the nocturnal visitor.

Still sobbing bitterly she said something about a "lodger" and from that moment the conversation was carried on in so low a whisper that, although Laura Elmer heard the murmuring, she could not distinguish the words. This low, muttering conversation went on all night—went on till day was dawning in the east, when Laura Elmer, worn out by two nights' watching, dropped asleep in her chair, and slept heavily for many hours.

When she awoke it was broad day; the sun was high in the heavens. She opened her eyes and looked around in astonishment at finding herself in a strange place, and it was some seconds before she could remember how she came there. Then full consciousness of her misfortunes returned; the murder of Sir Vincent Lester; the imprisonment of Ferdinand Cassinove; her own change of residence; the discovery in regard to Mrs. Russel's husband; and, lastly, that the strange nocturnal visit, all recurred clearly to her memory.

Her resolution was soon taken. She arose and bathed her feverish face, and arranged her disordered hair, and then rang her bell.

Mrs. Russel, pale and haggard, as with fatigue and care, entered the room, saying:

"I hope you rested well, Miss Elmer?"

"No; I have not been in bed all night. I have something to say to you this morning. Please sit down; you first sit down; you look, indeed, quite unable to stand."

Mrs. Russel dropped into the nearest seat.

Miss Elmer resumed her easy chair, saying:

"I am exceedingly sorry for you, Mrs. Russel, but that does not alter the course of my duty. I must tell you that I heard the arrival of your visitor last night, and overheard much of your conversation, by which I was enabled to identify the individual. This morning I must lay before the police all the particulars with which I have become acquainted, as well as my own private suspicions. As I cannot constantly continue in your house while engaged in this ungracious work, I must leave you to-day. But you will permit me to pay you for the whole term for which my lodgings were engaged; and I wish you, further, to rest assured of my esteem and friendship, and willing services in everything in which I can aid you without injuring the ends of justice."

"Miss Elmer, I cannot complain. Deeply as I suffer in this affair; I know that you are perfectly right in all that you do. But poor as I am, I cannot accept from you payment for the lodgings that you have occupied only a day, and that you leave this morning, from caprice, but from a sort of necessity," said Mrs. Russel, weeping piteously.

"I am glad you perceive I cannot do otherwise than I am about to do. But for your children's sake, I wish you would permit me to pay for the whole term for which I took the lodgings; it would be to do what one leaves before the term is up."

"Yes; but not when they have been contracted but for a day, and are left from necessity. So let us say no more about it, Miss Elmer."

Laura perceived that to press this point would only wound the sensitive self-respect of the poor woman, and desisted.

"You forbear making any inquiries about my visitor of last night, Miss Elmer; yet this piece of information I will volunteer. He is off again, and I know not where he has gone, for when he will come back, or if he ever will return," said Mrs. Russel.

"And after the manner of such villians, he has taken away all your funds with him!" said Laura, indignantly.

Mrs. Russel evidently could not deny this fact.

"Then I will tell you when he will return—as soon as that money is exhausted. Mrs. Russel, I should think you would be glad of any law that would free you entirely from such a beast of prey."

"Ah! but my children."

"Even for their sake it were well that such a moral leper were swept from the face of the earth, lest the very relationship should contaminate them. Were I in your place I should deliver that monster up to justice with less compunction than ever I killed a venomous serpent. I should do it to save my children from the fatal infection of his presence and example. I should consider my mother duty the most sacred on earth. Oh! it is a lamentable weakness in any woman to shield a worthless and depraved man, at the risk of perpetuating an evil example to her innocent children. And, Mrs. Russel, I think that I shall be doing you and them a good service in bringing this incorrigible villain to justice," said this severe young Nemesis, who was beginning to lose patience at the maudlin weakness of the flesh betrayed by poor Ruth Russel.

"Ah! but you don't know. You haven't been tried in such a way. Besides, if ever you were to talk with him, you would not think so ill of him," said the meek little woman.

"I am very sorry for you. I do not willingly wound you, only I would be glad to see you with a clearer moral vision, and a greater moral strength," replied Laura, gently.

"I do not complain. And now, Miss Elmer, you will at least breakfast before you go."

"Yes; thank you."

"And when shall I order a cab?"

"Immediately after breakfast, if you please, Mrs. Russel."

The landlady left the room to fulfill these directions, and immediately after breakfast Miss Elmer went out in a cab to procure new lodgings. Her circumstances did not permit her to be fastidious. She secured the most respectable lodgings to be found nearest to Newgate, and into them she removed in the course of the same forenoon.

She sent her new address to Dr. Clark, with a request that he would call upon her at his earliest convenience.

And the doctor, astonished at the change of quarters, for which he could not account, called on her in the afternoon.

He found Miss Elmer busily writing at the centre table of her gloomy new parlor. She arose to meet him, saying:

"This is very kind, Dr. Clark. You find me making minutes of a chain of evidence, or rather of probabilities which I wish to submit to you. I feel convinced that I have got the clew to the real murderer of Sir Vincent."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the doctor, in astonishment. "Let me hear."

Miss Elmer commenced and related all the circumstances of her fragmentary acquaintance with Sir Vincent Lester's protegee, Helen Ravenscroft; the mysterious stranger that Waylield had followed her carriage; the midnight interview and angry words that passed between this stranger and the baronet upon the occasion when she accidentally discovered them together; and finally the conversation that had recently passed between herself and Ruth Russel, in which she was enabled to put certain disjointed incidents together, and identify the mysterious "light-haired man" with a certain notorious criminal who had fled from justice years before.

"Now deep in my heart is the conviction that this man and no other was the assassin of the unfortunate baronet," concluded Laura.

"Good heaven! and yet you do not know the circumstance that makes that the most probable thing in the world!" exclaimed the doctor.

Laura looked up, full of interest.

"That criminal fled from trial and Sir Vincent Lester was the principal witness against him; indeed, without the testimony of Sir Vincent Lester, I doubt if it would have been possible to convict him," said the doctor.

"Then there is the motive established at once for the assassination!" exclaimed Laura, with increasing excitement.

"Yes, the very strongest motive that can possibly actuate human nature—that of self-preservation."

"Oh, then, let us go at once to some magistrate and lodge this information, and procure a warrant for the arrest of this man, and, if possible, an order for the liberation of Mr. Cassinove."

The doctor smiled compassionately, saying:

"Ladies know but little of the formulas of law, my dear Miss Elmer, else you would be aware that though we may procure a warrant for the arrest of this man, we cannot possibly procure the liberation of young Cassinove. Having been duly committed by the jury to answer the charge of murder, he must remain a prisoner until his trial shall have ended in his acquittal or conviction."

The doctor left the other words unspoken.

"Oh! but that is very hard!" said Laura.

"It is; and I must remind you of another set of circumstances—namely, that the evidence against Ferdinand Cassinove, whom we believe to be innocent, is much stronger than that against the man whom we believe to be the assassin of Sir Vincent. Indeed, I doubt whether you have any evidence to give that would justify you in going before a magistrate and laying the information we possess. I will wait while you put on your bonnet."

Laura Elmer did not keep the good doctor waiting five minutes, but went into her adjoining chamber, and in a few seconds returned, shawled, bonneted and gloved for the expedition. The doctor handed her into his carriage, and they set out for Bow street.

Arrived there, they had to wait some time before the magistrate was at leisure to attend to them; and when at length he was disengaged, the doctor requested that the office might be cleared, as the information he had to give had best be given in private. The character and position of Dr. Clark ensured a prompt attention to his request. When the office was cleared of all except the magistrate, his clerk, the doctor and Miss Elmer, the latter advanced, and being sworn, made her statement. Now everything, even remotely connected with the tragedy of Lester House, was of the utmost interest to the authorities. Miss Elmer's statement received a candid and attentive hearing, and the magistrate thought the information of sufficient importance to justify him in issuing a warrant for the apprehension of the accused.

Every Home Needs Zam-Buk.

EXPERIENCES OF HOUSEKEEPERS WHO KEEP IT HANDY.

In every home cuts, bruises, scalds and minor injuries are sure to occur, especially where there are children. In most homes too chapped hands, chilblains, eczema, ringworm, ulcers and bad legs are frequent troubles.

For these you need a balm which is pure, herbal, free from mineral compounds, free from animal fat, antiseptic, able to stop bleeding and which should heal.

Zam-Buk meets all these requirements. Why not prove its merits. Read this:—

Mrs. Burgess, of Pemelon Falls, says, "In 40 years of housekeeping I have had many cuts and burns which gave me trouble, but Zam-Buk is the best remedy I ever used. Doctor's treatment brought no relief, and at one time it was thought my daughter would end the agony. I suffered. Zam-Buk was brought to me. I bought a few boxes. Before the first box gave me more ease and comfort. Yesterday I am quite cured, the limb is sound, and whereas before I could not stand, now I walk up and down steps with ease. Zam-Buk will do Zam-Buk's work."

Mrs. Jones, of Cascades, eczema, cold sores, ringworm, stiff joints, bad legs, Cassinove, whom we believe to be innocent, is much stronger than that against the man whom we believe to be the assassin of Sir Vincent. Indeed, I doubt whether you have any evidence to give that would justify you in going before a magistrate and laying the information we possess. I will wait while you put on your bonnet."

VEXING SOCIAL PROBLEMS SOLVED.

To Debutante: Remember when talking to Mr. Grimalkin to raise your voice and never to speak in high, shrill tones.

Do not allow yourself to get into the habit of saying "ain't."

Speak grammatically, and study the writings of the best authors.

Never say "ma'am." It is best to say "Yes, Mrs. B—" or "No, Mother."

Never use the prefixes "Mrs" or "Mister" without the person's name and not speak of your "lady friends," simply call them your "friends."

It is best also to speak of "men" and "women," not "ladies" and "gentlemen" unless one wishes to make some special distinction in mentioning them.

Try not to use wrong adjectives, such as "An elegant morning" or "An elegant piece of meat."

Men are sometimes "hanged"; pictures are "hung."

Never say "ain't for isn't." It is best to say "are not" and "is not."

Do not say "it is him" or "it is me." You should say "it is he" and "it is I."

Also, "He is older than I," not "older than me"; "taller than I," not taller than him."

When referring to a person always use his name; do not say "him," or "he," or "she."

You have finished your breakfast; You are not "through" your breakfast.

In speaking of servants do not say the "girls." Say the "maids," the "servant," or mention the class of servant as "waitress" or "cook."

One can be so easily careless in the expressions used in conversation, so let me advise you to make a careful study of the correct use of words.

TRAINING AND PAYMENT OF TEACHERS.

Thursday p.m. Mr. J. J. Tilley, Inspector of Public Schools, Napanee, a lecture to teachers, students and the public on the subject of the new Department Regulations, on the training and payment of teachers. He spoke for over an hour to a most interested audience. He showed that the new regulations were due to the fact that under the existing conditions the teaching profession was unstable and constantly losing its best talent and that the desire of the government was an attempt to equalize the conditions whereby each citizen is required to provide education for the rising generation. The discussion was of a very impartial nature and indicated that Mr. Tilley's purpose was to further the educational interests of our country. At the close of the meeting a hearty vote of thanks, moved by Mr. D. L. Hill, and seconded by Mr. E. Ming Chairman of the Board, was unanimously tendered to the speaker.

Thoroughness.

This store isn't perfect. But it is best—best because of its thoroughness.

Said a man who often is given the task of buying by his wife, "When I had to get anything I used to go all around the stores until I found what was needed.

"Finding it by far the oftenest at Robinson's. I start with that store now, and seldom have to go to any other."

That we loose money on many actual sales is certain. But that it is a final loss we deny—it's all in the business of good serving; thoroughness.

This store is less than good if it fails to supply in the best way possible every item you can expect in the lines of goods we carry.

Hogs Wanted.

Messrs. VanLuven & Hambly will ship Stock Cars Tuesday next, Nov. 20th. Highest market price will be paid for hogs weighing 150 lbs. and over. All hogs must be delivered before 4 o'clock p.m.

IMPORTANT NEWS FROM THE FUR DEPT.

ABOUT LADIES' FUR JACKETS.

It makes no difference to us whether you want a Fur Jacket for street wear or for a driving garment. In selecting our stock we have kept in mind the fact that every person who purchases a fur jacket does not intend to put it to the same use. Some want them for comfort and durability, others for the dressy addition they make to their street appearance. We have them to suit every possible requirement, and all we ask is an opportunity to show you what we can do for you in this line.

PERSIAN LAMB JACKETS. Up-to-date style, in plain or trimmed collar and lapels, medium sized curl, very glossy, at from 110.00 to 175.00. If you purpose purchasing a Persian this season, do so now, as we can't repeat these coats at the price.

FRENCH SEAL COATS. This coat combines style and durability. Don't conflict this fur with Electric or Near Seal. It is an entirely different fur, and we heartily recommend it to you as a good serviceable coat. We sold it at 60.00 last season, but want to do something extra special this season, and at 50.00 they are undoubtedly the best value we ever offered.

This same Jacket with blendid Muskrat Collar and Cuffs at 60.00.

MUSKRAT JACKETS. This coat is certainly deserving of more attention than it has been receiving. In the larger centres it is selling as a very stylish garment. Ask to see them. We have them in blended or natural shades.

ASTRACHAN JACKETS. We would impress on you the fact that our Astrachan Jackets are made from German dyed skins. After the jacket is put together the skins are backed with a heavy canvas covering which is attached in a substantial way. This takes all the strain from the pelt, and adds a good many years to the life of the Jacket.

We have all kinds of combinations in Jackets. Trimmed with Sable Dyed Coon, Alaska Sable, Muskrat, etc. In fact we pride ourselves on having the best selection ever shown the people in this district.

If you come to us we won't deceive you, but will give you the best there is for your money, no matter what amount you wish to lay out.

Xmas is Coming.

Stylish Tweed Coats for Women

We have just received another lot of Tweed Coats. Real smart looking styles made up in the new checks, plaids and mingles. Every garment in the lot is man tailored. Shoulders are well built out, lapels and collar lay down flat and smooth. Fronts hang true without being buttoned. Reasonable prices, 10.00, 12.50, 15.00.

More Womens' Black Coats.

Fashion has taken so kindly to black coats that we have had difficulty in getting enough. We now show three new styles that were copied from imported models. Designe that are distinctly exclusive. Sizes, 34, 36, 38. Made from all wool smooth Black Kersey, 15.00, 17.00, 20.00.

This Skirt $8.00.

This cut shows one of our 3.00 skirts, seven gored, made in black and navy Cheviot. Our ready-to-wear skirt business has developed wonderfully. We have in stock hundreds to choose from. If we cannot fit you with stock size, we can take your measure and deliver to your order a skirt in three days. Ask to see our new tweeds and worsteds, also venetians in the new crushed grape and wine shades.

Material by the Yard to Match our Ready-to-wear Skirts.

So often we have people who would like to buy our ready-to-wear skirts if they could get the same material by the yard to make a waist, eton jacket or separate coat. We have completed arrangements by which we can procure the exact length required to match a great many of our skirts.

Linol-shine, the New Preserver of Linoleums.

Lino-shine is a varnish like preserver and improver for Linoleums. It fills up the pores of the fabric, increases the wear 'and improves the appearance. For sale in our Carpet Department. Price, 50 cents a can.

Ribbons at Dry Goods Prices.

—Xmas is Coming—

YARD WIDE WOOLS AND UNION CARPETS.

Yard wide reversible Carpets are used a great deal for bedrooms. Indeed many a best room would not be complete without them. Our three ply all wool carpets will wear for generations. We had a woman in our carpet room the other day that has a three ply all wool carpet in use so long that when asked by her daughter "where she bought it", she could not remember.

UNIONS, yard wide, reversible, 30c, 48c, 50c.
2 PLY ALL WOOL, 36 inches wide, reversible, 65c, 68c, 75c.
3 PLY ALL WOOL. Our Imperial brand is the same kind that we have been selling for years. While present stock lasts we will continue selling at old price, $1.00 yd.

Jute and Hemp Carpets.

Nothing to equal them at such low prices as 10c, 15c, 22 1/2c, 18c, 25c yard.

Low Priced Stair Carpets.

Not high class, but you will admit their good value for 15c, 20c, 25c yd.

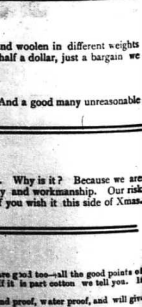
Wool and Union Rugs.

We have the same quality carpets as we sell by the yard, woven all in one piece without seams. Sizes, 2 1/2 x 3 yds., 3 x 4 yds., 3 1/2 x 4 1/2 yds., 4 x 4 1/2 yds., $4.00 to $20.00.

HENDERSON CORSET.

Made in Chicago.

(Why we advertise Henderson Corset.)



LA PRINCESSE HABIT BACK MODEL
It Laces in Front

It does not pay us to advertise a poor thing. To urge, advise and recommend that you buy some inferior article hurts us, because you will remember the injury we have done you, because you have a degree of confidence in us and we can't afford to push an unsatisfactory item.

This applies to corsets with perhaps greater force than with any other article of wear, and we advertise Henderson corset because the satisfaction to the wearer is great, and second sales come without effort on our part.

We have three different styles of this corset in stock. These styles all lace in front, which give a perfect fit in the back, viz. :

920, made of a fine cottile, at $3.00.

970, Silk and Linen, at $5.00.

La Princess, all Silk, at $7.50.

—Xmas is Coming—

MEN'S SOCKS AND UNDERWEAR.

What's your preference—cotton or woolen—for winter socks? Heavy cotton for those who cannot wear woolen; and woolen in different weights for those who like them: Full fashioned Heather Mixed Fancy Socks, medium weight at 18c, value 25c, or three pairs for half a dollar, just a bargain we happened on. Cotton socks at 10c, 12 1-2c, 15c, 20c and 25c. Woolen Socks in natural colors, black, tans, etc., 25c.

Victor Brand Cashmere Hose, a special feature with us, worth 50c, our special price, 3 pairs for $1.00.

In Underwear—Heavy winter weight cotton, ribbed, 50c a garment.

Fleece Lined Heavy Penman make, 50c a garment. Any reasonable man will find underwear here that suits him. And a good many unreasonable men, that is men with notions, can be satisfied also. These Underwear Stocks are broad in varieties.

OUR MADE-TO-ORDER MEN'S CLOTHING DEPARTMENT

Never was so busy. The orders have been pouring in this last two weeks until we are driven to work early and late. Why is it? Because we are turning out the best fitting, most up-to-date and best made garments in Napanee, and our prices are low, considering quality and workmanship. Our risk entirely as to fit. The stock of Woolens we show is unequalled outside of the largest cities. Let us have your order soon if you wish it this side of Xmas. Frock Suits and Dress Suits a specialty.

MEN'S AND YOUTH'S CLOTHING DISTINCTIVELY GOOD.

The Robinson Co. Clothing business is growing as never before. It ought to, for it is the one safe and sure store. Robinson styles are good too—all the good points of merchant tailoring in this ready-to-wear store. When clothing among the cheap lines is mixed with cotton we never interspersed to you. If it is part cotton we tell you. If it is all wool we tell you. We surely have won our business by fairness. Winter Overcoats, $7.50 to $18.50. Winter Suits, $5.00 to $17.50.

Frieze Reefer Special for Men, worth $6.00, our special price $5.00. Made of a heavy Frieze and lined with a Rubberized Lining, wind proof, water proof, and will give more than ordinary wear. Ulsters of same material, $6.00.

Besides the regular stock of Men's and Boys' Suits and Overcoats there are some GREAT BARGAINS—odd lots reduced in price to clear—lots that are scarce and it remain more than a few days. If you just want a knockabout suit, ask for one of these reduced bargains and see how much money we will save you.

HE SHOT A DEER OUT OF SEASON.

Toronto News.

Stanley M. Clapp, of 15 Vonge Street Arcade, pleaded guilty Monday morning before Magistrate Denison to shooting a deer in the close season.

Mr. Clapp was duck shooting on a little island near Washaubenee, Georgian Bay, on Oct. 19th, and the deer ran up to within ten yards of him. Mr. Clapp could not resist the temptation, and his rifle spoke with fatal effect.

"I don't know whether this charge is in my jurisdiction," said the Magistrate.

"Well, I plead guilty," said Mr. Clapp.

"I will remand the case until to-morrow," said his Worship.

Staff Inspector Archibald said the charge against Mr. Clapp, on word received from Waubaushene. The deer was not shipped to Toronto, Mr. Clapp dividing it among a number of duck shooters in the district. Mr. Clapp brought home a haunch in his grip, as his portion of the spoils.

BORE THE DIVINE IMAGE

HUMAN RACE THE APEX OF GOD'S CREATION OF THE WORLD.

"BEHOLD IT WAS VERY GOOD"

His Own Image Was Not a Material One, But After God's Spirit—Immortality the Root of God-Like-ness of Man—Man Alive, Man Never Dies, But Is Translated to Another Life—A Wonderful Fact.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1906, by Frederick Dixon, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 11.—The inferences from the Scriptural statement that the human race originally bore the divine image are impressively pointed out by a few gowning in this sermon, from the text Genesis i, 27, "So God created man in his own image."

The first leaf of the world's history had been turned. The stupendous task of creation approached completion. God surveyed it and pronounced it very good. The illuminating fires had been kindled, and the command had gone forth, "Let there be light," and there was light. The heavens were hung with tapestries of blue, and the white clouds of the day were rimmed with gold and the black curtains of the night bespangled. Every star was in its place. And God saw the light that it was good, and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.

That the day and night be separated from the deep seas the waters were driven back until they crouched and growled and fawned at the foot of the mountains. The great hollows were scooped out of the ocean bed and tossed into heaps. The rivers were turned loose and allowed to cut their way through the valleys and squirm among the hills and push on and on in their serpentine windings until they were lost in the great bosom of the seas. Then Mount Shasta arose and stood sentinel over the Pacific. The Matterhorn was detailed to keep its eyes upon the Mediterranean, and Mount Washington was stationed to watch the Atlantic. Then the volcanoes had their hemorrhages and breathed forth their hot breath and vomited in their awful agonies.

Then Flora rambled forth to cover up the ghastly wounds of a suffering world, with her bandages of green and yellow and white. She planted the crocus at the foot of the mountains and covered the hillsides with forests, and scattered her seeds far and wide in the valleys. Then she shared the shadows from under the trees, she sprang from the lowlands and climbed the lofty cliffs, enclothing rival vines and that crag, balancing here and nestling there, until at last the rocks, like Jacob's favorite son, stood bedecked in garments of many colors. The garden of Eden was shloom. The desert was blossoming as the rose. The sandy wastes had the red rose and the blue forgetmenot, as high priestesses before the altars of the mountains, were swinging their incense of praise: "And the earth brought forth grass and herb, yielding seed after its kind, and the tree yielding fruit whose seed was in itself after its kind, and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day."

Then God reached forth his hand and touched the waters, and the mighty leviathans of the deep began to move. The goldfish, among the sea weed entangled thickets of kelp. The speckled trout leaped from the eddy. The wonderful nostrums of the sea had their myriads of inhabitants. Then God touched the land, and the woods were turned into a great menagerie, and the valleys became a great pasture field, filled with browsing herds. Then he touched the air, and the heavens were filled with vibrating wings and made melodious with songs of the primal heavens of the skies. And God saw that all the works of his hand were good. "And the evening and the morning were the fifth day."

Everywhere we turn we see the blessing of God's creation. No grass could be greener, no sky could be blue, no songs could be sweeter. All the seas are the handiwork of God, and filled with glories. Thus all things were ready for man's advent. The supreme moment of the world's history had come. All other actors stood to perform their parts. Two mighty thrones of power were established, the one upon which was to sit the twain who were created only a little lower than the angels. So on the sixth day "God created man in his own image; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth and subdue it, and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth. And God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day."

Now, what does the word "image" in the great statement of God's creation mean? When God says, "I have made man in my own image," does it mean, as a great many suppose, that God intended to say that he was only "a magnified man?" "Oh, no," you answer; "that is not the meaning of that passage. The catechism tells us that God is a spirit, infinite, eternal and unchangeable. The idea of worshipping God as a physical body is a materialism little different from that of the savage. If we do this, we can bow before any painted idol just as the heathens have their hideous grotesque images, before which they kneel." That is true, my friend; that is absolutely true, if we persist in thinking of God and apply as a physical being, we are in exactly the same position as some of the Asiatic worshippers, who say that in the food every night and lay it upon the altar of their idol for their god to eat. Then men hide in the night, came and stole the food they thought their god ate it. Furthermore, they would not believe their idol did not eat it.

And this food until a northern conqueror lifted his battleaxe and smote the idol and broke it and pointed to the rats scurrying out of its ruins as they flee from a sinking ship. Thus when we say, "God made man after his own image," we mean God. "God breathed after the spirit of God." We are all ready to grant that. One little drop of water is like unto the great waters of the mighty deep. Thus, as an infinitesimal drop of water, is man created like unto the infinite spirit of God. Now, let us study for a little while in what sense man was created in the image of God.

The first god-like quality which overshadows all others is immortality. It is the fact that man is an immortal being. Though we may open the Bible and write up the family records and say my father was born Jan. 7, 1832, we have no right to say that he died April 12, 1892. We may speak of a child as having been born into this world on a certain hour of a certain day; but, strictly speaking, he will never die. He may die to our sight, but he is not really dead, but is translated to another life. He will never die. He will live on, as the monarchy of a European throne lives on. No sooner did the throne of England breathe her last than the Prince of Wales became king. He was there to live on longer than that. He will live on through the centuries and the millenniums and the ages. He will live on until the constellations of the heavens shall be snuffed out. He will live on until the very rocks grind to powder, crumble into dust with age and the mountains above us are incinerated and scattered to the four winds of space. Still man will live on. He will live forever and ever. He will never die. When the stars fall man will be as him immortal, as he is immortal.

This immortality of man is the most wonderful fact in the universe, for when I try to fully grasp what that one word "immortality" means I grow almost dizzy. The mountain ranges were towering one above another into endless space. When I try to comprehend what man, with all his powers of love and hate, joy and suffering, will live on and on forever, time is swallowed up in eternity. Oh, what a world! As a bird I can fly swifter than the light, yet its wings never tire. Those wings are destined to fly on forever and ever. "The wandering Jew" that Eugene Sue pictures was condemned on account of a past sin to live on until he outlived all his generation. He lived on, suffering the agonies of remorse, until he begged God to let him die. But man does not live on as did the great character of the French novelist. It was sins and is condemned for his sins, he must suffer an eternal punishment. He may plead with God to let him die, as the wounded soldier sometimes pleads with his comrades to shoot him to relieve him from pain, but his inherent nature can never die. Man is immortal. Man will live on and on forever.

Every thought that man is immortal we do not have to turn the leaves of the Bible to find. It is written in his finite truth is inborn in every human heart. We wander among the tombs of the ancients and read, "Here lies the end?" A piece of coin placed in the mouths of the dead to pay their way over the river Styx, for the ferryman of the river of Death was supposed to be paid, like every other ferryman. We see the mummied Arabs, and ask why do we find? The mourners about this corpse are not saying, "He is dead," but "He is alive." We pass to the inhabitants of the islands of the seas, and to the Aztecs of ancient Mexico, and the old mound builders of America, and everywhere we find the universal belief that the grave is not the end. Now, my friends, do you believe that this universal belief of the human race is the instinctive teaching of God or mere superstition. Listen to these words of Henry Ward Beecher; I would have given one of them born from the dead my soul: "I never saw a man who did not believe in the immortality of love when following the dead to the brink of the grave. I have seen men under other circumstances that did not believe in it, but I never saw one such. I have at has all come to that. The hours of sweet companionship, the wondrous joy of clasping hands, the heart full as joys, the hopes, the trusts, the unutterable yearnings—are there they all lie. No man stand and look into a coffin upon the body of a fellow creature and remember the fleeting intelligence, the blossoming of the mind, the whole range of divine faculties, which so lately animated that cold clay, and not believe that all collapsed into gloom. No person can witness the last sad ceremonials which are performed over the remains of a human being, the sealing down of the coffin, the nailing, the lowering of the coffin into the grave, the filling of the grave with earth, and the smoothing of the sod, the sacred words which are worse than thunder, and the planting of the green sod over the gravestone, and not feel that he is bound, can witness these things and then turn away and say, 'I have buried my wife,' 'I have buried my child,' 'I have buried my sister, my brother, my love.' No, no. No man can say it. Divine truth calling which must be in divine truth calling which must be in words of our conscience pleading with us to avoid evil and repent of our sins. Then we hear the voice of God walking in the garden and the voice which is calling to us, as it did to Paul, Webster in the Boston Zeit, saying: "You are a sinner. You must repent and renounce your sins. You must come to Christ." We are made in God's image. God has put conscience within us for a purpose to help us obey it, for we can never be truly happy until we are pure and true and good and just. As God is pure and true and good and just. Are you ready to-day to obey the pleadings of your conscience?

Now, my friends, are we ready to obey God's will and become like unto himself through the redemption and the blood of Jesus Christ? We have been talking about man as God first created him in his purity and simplicity. But sin has come into the world and so malformed us that we are far from perfect. The divine image is soiled and incrusted with the mire of sin. As we say of a man who has yielded to the power of drink that his mother would scarcely recognize in the sodden, blotched visage the face of the child she fondled in infancy so we do not see God's image in the sinful man; but, as Paul said to his people whom he had led to Christ, "Such were some of you, but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified." And he says, too, that they who behold "as in a mirror the glory of the Lord are changed into the same image." so the Holy Spirit of God is ready to be restored or brought to light by Christ.

Christ says, "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you." That means, "You shall again be stamped in my image if you will accept my offer of a new birth and a new nature." Will you do it? Will you to-day throw yourself upon his mercy and become partakers of his grace and dwell with him on earth and dwell with him forever and ever? Jesus said, "I am the way." Will you take that way to become like unto himself and dwell with him in heaven, my friend throughout eternity? The opportunity is yours if you will accept him, for God will recreate you in his own spiritual image. So God created man in his own image.

HARMFUL STOMACH DOSING.

NO NEED OF IT WHEN HYOMEI IS USED TO CURE CATARRH.

Physicians and scientists agree that the best medicine one can swallow, is the best medicine one can breathe, that is, in keeping with this idea that Hyomei is recommended by leading physicians throughout this and many catarrhal sections.

When this pleasant balm is used in catarrh troubles, there is no stomach dosing, for the medicine is breathed right to the spot where the trouble exists, thus destroying the germs, and entering the blood with the oxygen, driving all impurities from the system.

Do not try to cure catarrh of the head, throat or lungs with medicine that will not reach the seat of the trouble. Such efforts continued use will result in a complete and permanent cure.

The complete Hyomei outfit costs but $1.00, extra bottles, if needed, 50 cents. If your druggist does not carry Hyomei you can get it by mail on receipt of price, and Hyomei will be sold with the distinct understanding that if costs nothing unless it cures. Write for a 50 cent trial for a symptom blank, which we will send free to any address. Simply use on Catarrh and how to cure it. When you have it and return it to the Hyomei blank, our consulting physician will give your case his care and will write you a letter of advice without charge. The R. T. Booth Company, Buffalo, N.Y.

HIS BROTHER WON.

From the Rochester Herald.

The girl in the red dress came from school for two weeks. When the elder of the boys returned to his class he brought a note from the father stating that the cause of the absence of his children was illness.

"What was the matter, Dick?" asked the teacher, "Is he still sick?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied the pupil, "he's still in bed with a broken arm."

"I'm sorry to hear it. How did it happen?"

"Well, it was this way, ma'am. You see, Dick and I were trying to see which could throw a stone the nearest-story window the furthest, and Dick e'en."

Miss Annie Detlor leaves this week to take training in the dressmaking, under Mas Campbell, of Bath.

The young people of this locality are preparing for another good concert to take place on November 29th. Everybody welcome.

Mrs. J. M. Loyst has been very ill, but she is improving slowly.

Miss Nellie McDonald spent a few days in Napanee last week.

Farmers here have just about finished ploughing.

ADOLPHUSTOWN.

Our City Fathers' time is drawing near, and the candidates are speeding days of incessant toil for the favors of the voters. The taxes are high, excessively so, but is that where reward was given? The taxes run from one-quarter to double that figure in the townships. The question might be framed. "Why should the land in the township of wildest of uniform quality, and buildings being the only thing to vary? The question is easy answered. It is simply that the assessment has been revised the past two years, the assessors of the past good old school and lowered new ones, lowered good land and left poor land as it was. This sort of thing has got to cease, the County Road overseer has to do his whole well fence in the middle of the road between J. D. Allen and Ernest Membery's, as though the one fence between these two fellows were established there in the future. It is trip that it is all right, but it is not one any good, and to this one there may be a good one added. O'Dell Road will fall over it in the spring and break the first heavy rigs we carry. narrow tires will be broken to pieces, and conspiracy for the manufacture of new ones take place. Of course nothing is to be said of in the matter of the fence on the old rigs, it being supposed that such old rigs have served their time and lived long enough.

Mr. Chas. Torres and other grits in this Council, and some who might be put on council next year. So now the electors have their political fate in their hands, and it is to be hoped that the best man will be elected for each office of president, and the most suitable men of trust, thank fraternity, for the township, and not for the party. Let the coming election be regardless of politics.

The new government increased M. P. the other day, and after a second hand look at the matter I say "good fellow, I said you would do it." Now, why not go and cut out the Salary Grab?

Well, boys, I'm off for the present, leg we all play grab, Mr. Politician, the fellow that gets the most votes in honor of Kingston last fall.

Napanee Hope.

I suppose that the biggest boy in the town is Napanee.

It is true that our country is increasingly prosperous, greater than ever before, and the future of Canada shines bright—so long as the future looks rosy. But what is the present? It is, in my opinion, mostly due to the fact that the Liberals have received from the rotten and insincere Conservatives, and are trying to inform by the Government, to secure the confidence of the western country by experience. Now the question is, Are we western people going to put our heads down and our backs up and buckle on our armour and go to work and come out successful, or are we going to sit down and mope and wait for the past few years have come to pass, and we have a more favorable economical conditions, and we wait more of the same type. For my part I say "Looking Backwards and Planning Ahead" is the motto for me, and I am glad to see that the "better the land" idea is spreading in Ontario, and will be very appropriate to the old province, and is towards the "Garden of Eden," Columbia, come on from the west and the north and the east, and the south, and make this a valuable township,

Yours sincerely,
REVIEWER.

THE LATE MRS. GAULT.

Deseronto Tribune.

A telegram was received in town Sunday stating that Mrs. Gault, relict of the late John G. Gault, of Deseronto, who had died in Toronto, where she had been on a visit to her daughter, Mrs. Gore. Deceased, whose maiden name was Mary Ann Shaw, was born in Ireland. She was married in Londonderry, came to Canada in 1847 and lived in the city of Quebec for two years, when she came to Tyendinaga, living in Shannonville and Napanee for 7 years. They made their home in Mill Point twenty-seven years, and have lived here since. Mr. Gault died in 1866 eight years. She leaves to mourn, of whom seven are living. One son, James, died about eleven years ago. The deceased children are Napanee; Robert and Frank, of Manitoulin Island; and Thomas, of Deseronto. The living daughters are Mrs. Knapp, of Watertown, N.Y.; Mrs. Gaylord, of Canada, and Mrs. Gore, of Toronto. The deceased was a member of the Methodist church. Service was held at St. Mark's church, Napanee, on Tuesday last and to the Deseronto cemetery. Mrs. Gault was 84 years of age at the time of her death.

TRY THIS FOR YOUR COUGH

To relieve a cough or break up a cold in twenty-four hours, the Dominion Government analyst says the ingredients of which can be obtained of any good prescription druggist, and if taken as all that will be required: Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure) 1 drachm, Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure)—plainly printed thereon. There are many imitations and preparations of pine, but these only create nausea, and are of little benefit. Take only Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure). 46n

Youngster, triumphantly—Father, I am not sitting on the lowest form now. Perhaps you remember I got a step rising for you. But tell me how you came to have to go to higher form?

Father—Because I'm being punished.

"You naughty child, where have you been? You have been fighting, and have torn your best Sunday suit in your clothes. I'll have to buy you a new suit."

"Don't you may anything, ma. You ought to be glad that I'm a mailer or will have to buy a new boy."

Managed Like an Engine.

One-third of a housekeeper's life is spent in her kitchen.
One-half the labor of housekeeping is at the cook stove.
Your range can double or halve the cooking slavery of housekeeping.
A poor range adds worry as well as work, and worry multiplies the housekeeper's care.
Get a range that reduces the work and eliminates the worry.
The Pandora Range is as easily and accurately managed as an engine—it responds to the touch as quickly and certainly as the huge engine obeys the hand of the engineer.
The Pandora Range saves worry, and because worry kills, it prolongs life. Sold by enterprising dealers everywhere. Write for booklet.

FUNERAL OF REV. F. B. STRATTON.

The funeral services were held on Saturday, Nov. 10th. A large number of ministers from Kingston and outside were present, the following taking part in the services, Revds. Sparling, Manning, Eby, of Kingston, G. Brown and R. H. Leitch, of Belleville, J. R. Real, of Napanee, and Wm. Service, of Harrowsmith. The remains were taken to Sydenham street church, thence to the vault.

CHORAL CLUB.

The Ladies' Choral Club will meet next Tuesday evening at eight o'clock in the Town Hall for practice. A large number joined last week and it is earnestly hoped that more singers of our town will avail themselves of this opportunity to study choral work during the winter. It was the original intention of the Musical Club that every member of the Choral Club must also be a member of the Musical Club, but owing to the fact that several were engaged during the day and found it impossible to attend club meetings, it has been decided to allow members only may join the Choral Club, the fee being one dollar. For further particulars apply to the secretary of the club.

WOMEN WHO PAINT MINIATURES.

The New Idea Woman's Magazine for December contains an article over pages in length concerning the painting of miniatures by American women artists. In America, women appear to have led in this branch of art, which dates from the time of Charles I. Interesting accounts are given of the leading American women miniature painters, amongst whom are Miss Laura C. Hills, Miss Ethel Blanchard, Miss Martha Baker, Miss Magda Heuerman and Miss Anna Lynch. Miss Hills, who "has won the reputation of being the best American miniature painter of the present day," was trained at the Art Students' League in New York and the Art School in Boston. She began her career as an artist by designing Christmas cards and valentines. After having gained experience in these lines she worked with pastels, her pastels including figures and landscapes. Her work was characterised by rich coloring and great depth of feeling, and began to attract the attention of many able critics, but she was not satisfied here. She wanted a finer method of coloring than pastels, so took up the small brush. In the beginning her orders were small, but she was willing to make the sacrifice in order to realize her ambitions.

THE CHRISTMAS DELINEATOR.

The December Delineator is a typical Christmas number. It is sufficiently premature to assist Christmas-makers with its hints for Christmas gifts and holiday entertainments, besides containing an abundance of seasonable literature calculated to fit in from now until New Year's Day. Maud Ballington Booth contributes a most touching description of the work of the Volunteers, "Christmas Sunshine in the Shadows." Christmas stories for adults are "The Evergreen Tree," by Marion Ames Taggart and "The Shoplifter at Satterthwaite's," by William Hamilton Osborne, and those for children "The Blue Kimono," by Virginia Woodward Cloud, and "Betty Evolves a Christmas Idea," by Elizabeth Preston Badger. Agnes and Egerton Castle's romance, "A Young Conspirator," and Anthony Hope's short story, "The Duke's Allotment" seem specially suitable for reading on winter evenings. But the crown of the Christmas literature is Edwin Markham's splendid poem, entitled "The Great Guest Comes." It is illustrated in colors by J. C. Leyendecker. The usual amount of space is devoted to up-to-date fashions in garments and millinery, and practical papers and departments for housekeepers.

CLOSE OF THE BAZAAR.

The R. C. bazaar closed most successfully last Thursday evening with a grand drawing of prizes and a progressive euchre party. The ladies and all concerned are to be congratulated on the success of their effort, which we understand netted them $1,335. The prize winners were:

Gold Watch, ticket No. 435—A. W. Caton, Napanee.

Five o'clock tea service, No. 2889—C. J. Papineau, Napanee.

Silk umbrella, No. 2321—Mrs. F. F. Eden, Toronto.

Case of choice wines, No. 1246—Miss O'Donnell, Toronto.

Five dollar gold piece, No. 2642—Mrs. Wm. Hayes, Tamworth.

Silk embroidered tea cloth, No. 370—J. McCauley, New York.

Fancy bed spread, No. 4863—Carmelita Hunt, San Francisco, Cal.

The fern pot—H. Butler, Toronto.

The money bottle, containing $4.17, was won by Miss S. McDermid and Miss Margaret Meagher, of Napanee, each guessing the correct amount.

The drawing of prizes was conducted by Messrs. G. F. Ruttan, T. B. Wallace and W. T. Waller.

First and second ladies' prize, progressive euchre, were won by Mrs. E. McGuire and Mrs. D. J. Hogan, and consolation prize by Miss May Murphy. For the gentlemen, 1st Tim Hain first, Roy Greene second, and Bernard Murphy the consolation.

SUCCESSFUL NIMRODS.

Mr. W. L. Peters and son Everton, of Selby, were the first of the hunters to return from the north country. They returned last Friday with two fine bucks and a she bear and two cubs. Everton shot the bears, which were on exhibition at Anderson's meat market on Monday and Tuesday. The Peters were located at Lingham's Flats.

Mr. Hugh Fitzpatrick last week returned with a 200-lb. buck which he shot in the back country.

Miss Elmer and Dr. Clark had the satisfaction of seeing this warrant placed in the hands of Constable Hyslop, officer before leaving the magistrate's office.

From Bow street they repaired to Newgate to comfort the prisoner there with the intelligence of the clew they had obtained to the real assassin.

Meantime the officer with the warrant sought the accused first of all at the cottage of his wife in Chelsea; but Ruta Russel and her children had flitted with all their luggage, nor could any one tell whither they had gone.

CHAPTER XXVII.

From gloom to glare; from the prisoner's cell at Newgate to the drawing-room at Bereseleigh House.

Bereseleigh House was one blaze of light. Crowds of carriages blocked up the way for some distance up and down the street before the front of the house. The occasion was this: The young Duke and Duchess of Bereseleigh had returned from their bridal tour, and were receiving their "dear five hundred friends" at home.

The drawing-rooms, superbly furnished, beautifully adorned, and brilliantly lighted, were filled with the beauty, fashion and celebrity of society.

At one end the young duchess, the beautiful and happy bride, stood to receive her guests; the loveliest where many were lovely.

Her dress was arranged with her usual artistic taste. It consisted of a full lace robe, light as a gossamer, worn over rose-colored silk, which gave blush roses in her hair, and pearl ornaments on her neck and arms. Never had Rose been happier than upon this evening, though even now she was not perfectly happy. We are never any of us at any moment of our lives. The shadow of Rose's light was the thought of Ferdinand Cassinove pining in his prison cell, and of Laura Elmer sorrowing in her gloomy lodgings. But the heart of Rose was full of hope; she had the perfect rectitude of purpose in the innocence of Cassinove, and great faith in Providence; she was doing, and she meant to do, all in her power to serve Cassinove; and she had in her own heart not a single doubt either of the perfect rectitude of purpose or of his final acquittal and full exoneration from suspicion. Therefore she put away all pensiveness, turned her back upon the shadow and faced the sunshine; dispensed with smiles with equal sincerity and affability; and even, at length, joined the dance. It was while she was still dancing that she noticed her own especial footman lingering near the door, as if anxious, yet afraid, to speak.

Seeing this, and surmising that he might be the bearer of some note from Laura Elmer, she took the earliest opportunity, when the dance was over, to move near the door, and beckon the man to her side.

He came in, and drawing near, said:

"I beg pardon, your grace, but there is a person below that is very urgent to see you upon the most important business."

"Well, show him into the library, Miller, and say that I will see him in a few minutes. And do you yourself be there to attend him."

"Yes, your grace," said the servant, bowing and retiring.

Rose entered the library, which was lighted but by one chandelier hanging from the ceiling over the central table. At this table stood a rather "shabby-genteel" looking man, with his back turned, and his hands in his pockets.

Rose, kindly wishing to put this impoverished-looking gentleman at his ease, advanced toward him, speaking pleasantly, and saying:

"You have come to me from Miss Elmer—or Mr. Cassinove? Pray take a seat, sir."

"No, madam, I have not come from Mr. Cassinove or Miss Elmer," said the visitor, in a singularly sweet and clear voice, as he turned around and bowed deeply to the young duchess.

Rose then saw before her a fine-looking man, with a tall and graceful figure, a stately head, well covered with glossy, light yellow hair, that waved around a forehead high, pure and open as that of boyhood; delicately-arched eyebrows, clear, gentle, blue eyes, straight nose, finely-cut, curved lips, all blended into a charming expression of kindliness and gay good-humor.

The young duchess looked up at this face smiling sweetly down upon her, a horrible consciousness, through many rapid changes, first a vague surprise, then a fearful suspicion, lastly a horrible recognition, with that cry of anguish we all utter in our extremity:

"Oh, my God!"

She threw her hands up to her face, reeled back and sank upon the sofa behind her. The visitor deliberately crossed the room, folded his arms across his broad chest, and standing before her, said:

"My sudden appearance has startled you, madam, the duchess! Your grace scarcely expected to see me here!"

There are shocks so great that they kill the weak and stun the strong into a state resembling calmness. This was such a one to the young duchess. It did not crush—it calmed her. Though pale as death, she quietly motioned her strange visitor to a seat, and when he had taken it, said:

"In the name of Heaven, have you returned from the grave to ruin me?"

"No, mine own; I have returned only from the Continent. I am no ghost, but solid flesh and blood, as I can soon convince you," said the visitor, gayly, rising and holding out his arms, as if to embrace her.

"Stop! No nearer, on your life and soul!" said Rose, speaking in a deep, stern voice, that sounded strangely and fearfully from those bloodless lips, and extending her left hand in a forbidding gesture.

He sank back in his chair, regarding her with wonder and curiosity.

"In the name of Heaven, I adjure you to tell me—why did you not keep your own counsel when you came to me from the Continent?

ess of Bereleigh and baroness Etheridge of Swinburne.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Happily, the Dowager Duchess of Bereleigh and the Ladies Wardour had quitted the kingdom before the fall of the thunderbolt upon their ancient and noble house.

More humbly, the unaffected humility, the simple kindness, and the innocent gayety of the young duchess, had made all who were friends as her surpassing beauty, exalted rank, and distinguished success had made secret enemies; and thus, though society was shocked to its foundation by the news of her arrest upon so grave a charge, yet she was not left without warm advocates among the most eminent men and women of the world. And, most happily, Rose was as innocent as a child, not only of the crime imputed to her, but of every thought connected with such sin. With the most disdainful exaggeration of meaning on the part of her enemies, the indictment of bigamy had been preferred at the Old Bailey, where, among the lowest and worst criminals of Newgate, Rose shuddered at the thought of appearing.

Willingly would Rose have died alone to spare remote region, whence she never more might look upon her husband, could she have borne away with her into the wilderness the knowledge of her husband, leaving him happy. But this could not be. Rose was greatly beloved, not only by her husband, but by many devoted friends who remained faithful to her in her deep distress, and this it could be in humility, gratitude and trust, she placed herself in their hands to be guided by their united counsels.

The proceedings instituted against her, and based upon so slight a foundation as unfinished marriage ceremony, might possibly have been quashed, but the arrest and the charge having been made public, it was deemed, by the duke and his friends, essential to the fair fame of the young duchess that she should be vindicated by an open trial, but not at the Old Bailey.

For, though her legal right to the title of the Duchess of Bereleigh, and the honors and immunities belonging to the rank, was now questioned, as to as the Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne, she had the right to claim a hearing before the highest tribunal in the realm.

It was therefore by the advice of her friends, and the express desire of her husband, that she exercised her right of peerage, demanded a trial by the House of Lords, and remained quietly in London to await the issue.

The trial was arranged to be commenced on the fourteenth of the ensuing May.

Meanwhile the cavilers, haters and maligners at the high estate the young duchess were busy with her name and fame. Her antecedents were brought up with many exaggerations, distortions and inventions. The particulars of the alleged first marriage were not known, but what was missing in fact was supplied by fancy. The blackest slanders were circulated, and in order to set the seal of truth upon the packet of falsehood, they said that the Dowager Duchess of Bereleigh and the Ladies Wardour had abandoned the young duchess, a circumstance untrue, that looked very black for the latter.

The duke and duchess were sitting together in the drawing-room early in the evening, discussing this new calumny, when the doorbell rang.

"Who can be coming at this hour of the night? It is an odd hour for visitors to call," said the duke, impatiently.

Rose, tired at a little bustle of arriving visitors, listened like a startled fawn.

Then followed the opening of the hall door, and a little bustle of arrival, and in another minute the drawing-room door was thrown open, and a footman announced:

"Her grace, the duchess, and the young ladies."

CHAPTER XXX.

The duchess drawer, with her hands stretched out, and her eyes full of tears, advanced towards her son and his wife, saying:

"My dearest George! my dear, dear Rose! You will let me depart and remain abroad, while this great trouble was impending over you! Oh, George, would you have me my children's love? Could you, Rose, doubt one who has tried to fill a mother's place toward you? Indeed, no more! If sorrow has come upon you, my children, your mother must bear it with you. If disaster, she must share it! The hour of adversity and danger is not the time for a family to be separated. United we stand; divided we fall!'"

She looked like a queen or a goddess, as she stood there in her noble rectitude.

The young duke released Rose, and with a look of irrepressible confidence, turned and clasped his mother to his heart.

Rose, released from his embrace, sank at her mother's feet, sobbing forth:

"Oh, madam! Oh lady! I had rather died than have brought this sorrow upon you."

The duchess stooped and raised her up, saying:

"Come to my bosom, poor wounded dove, and believe that all evils from which we cannot save you, we will share with you."

"And—the Ladies Wardour?" said the duke, turning a questioning glance toward them.

"They are my daughters and your sisters," said the duchess, significantly, while the young ladies, with tearful eyes and extended hands, came forward, and silently embraced their brother and sister-in-law. No miserable egotism, no mean question as to how the impending calamity might affect them as to their prospects in life, had any place in the souls of these noble girls.

"But, oh! is it possible!" said Rose, with her voice half-drowned in tears, "that heaven has set its seal upon such a dreadful charge, and knowing nothing of the particulars, you still had so much faith as to say that you could not believe me guilty?"

"No," said the duchess, emphatically and solemnly, "I knew you could not, too well, sweet Rose. And now dismiss forever from your mind the idea that you have brought this sorrow upon us. Providence visits us all with a trial in which you have no responsible part to bear, and we the duty of making it as light as possible," concluded her grace, tenderly; "resume your seat."

In an hour from that time the re-united family stepped together cheerfully, as though an impending calamity lowered darkly over their heads.

That night, for the first time since her arrest, poor Rose retired to bed tranquilized. And the next morning all London knew that the duchess downgrace, as soon as she heard in Paris of the arrest of her daughter-in-law upon a criminal charge, had hastened home to sustain her through the approaching trial that was arranged to be commenced on the fourteenth of May.

In all the woe of this world there is no anxiety so intense as that which precedes a trial for life, and no despair so deep as that which follows the sentence of death.

Such an anxiety now held the soul of Laura Elmer in a state of tension to which a physical torture is the only comparison. Nothing could be done. A despair loomed darkly before her. All the strong hopes that had supported her in the first days of Cassinove's imprisonment had utterly given way before the imminent blow of impending doom.

Darker and heavier lowered the shadow over the devoted head of the prisoner.

She had done all that was possible, and had failed of doing any good.

The warrant that she had caused to be issued for the arrest of Thugsen, alias Roberts, alias Rayburne, had been served upon him. Indeed, that mysterious individual, far from avoiding the officers of justice, had purposely thrown himself in their way, giving himself up to "the law in the shape once for all," as he laughingly declared. He had been taken before the Bow street magistrate, but when he had been very carefully examined; but in the absence of any positive evidence and reflect on all that I had told you. and reflect on all that I had told you. Put away all worldly thoughts and all conventional ideas. Think only of justice, faith and mercy. Pray to the Lord for direction, and to-morrow, when you visit Cassinove, you will know what to say and do," replied Laura Elmer, with sweet gravity, and she arose as if to close the interview.

He also arose. He looked at her—beautiful, pale statue that she seemed—and taking her hand, replied:

"I will, my child, I will; and may the Lord grant that I may find and declare comfort you. Good-night." And he raised her hand to his lips, and departed.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The next day Dr. Clark had an interview with Cassinove at Newgate, and pointed out to him that the only course to prevent Laura giving evidence was to plead guilty.

Cassinove at first demurred, but the good doctor easily persuaded him that it would be for the best.

And then he took his leave for a short time to make the arrangements for the strange interview.

First he called at the lodgings of Miss Elmer, whom he found dressed as if for a walk.

"My carriage is at the door, my child, and if you are going to visit our prisoner this morning, I am glad to take you there," said the doctor, artfully.

"I thank you; I was just going; I am quite ready, and need not detain you an instant," said Miss Elmer, joining him.

He took her to the prison, through all the hideous passages to the cell of Cassinove, saw her enter, and then withdrew to procure the special license from the Archbishop of Canterbury, old pastor, the Rev. Henry Watson, of St. Matthews. He found the good old man in his study in an agony of perplexity, explained to him the service for which he was wanted.

Few, and very few who had had an unshaken faith in the innocence of Cassinove, was the Rev. Mr. Watson, the pastor, with whom he was in intimately from childhood up to maturity. So after a little hesitation the arrangements were made as required of him, and after being assured by the doctor that there was no impediment, only the marriage should be solemnized, the good man yielded to his faith in his friend, the Cassinove, and though greatly mystified, consented to go and perform the ceremony.

In the meantime Laura Elmer had passed into the cell of her betrothed.

Cassinove was sitting just where the doctor had left him, on the side of his mattress, with his hands clasped together, and his head sunk upon his breast. He looked up as Laura entered, and rising, extended his hands to her, saying:

"Oh, Laura! oh, my guardian spirit! can you surmise what Dr. Clark has been saying to me this morning?"

"Yes, yes, mine own; I sent him to say it," replied Laura Elmer, with noble truthfulness, as she placed both her hands in his.

"And are you my beautiful preserver, prepared for the sacrifice which, I fear, I fear it is doing a great wrong to ask of you?"

"It will be no sacrifice on my part. It is the only possible way to save yourself from an unjustly-inflicted death, and my life is worth little."

"Alas! Laura! when I first met and worshiped you—when I first dared to dream of the time when you might be my own—this was not the sort of bridal I pictured to myself!" said Cassinove, with a deep groan.

"No, my own; you thought of conquering fortune, and laying it at my feet and of finding me in a position higher, if possible, than that from which I fell. This is what you planned for me. And because you planned it, and because it pleased Heaven to disappoint your generous plan, how can I, your side, as willing—oh, yes—as willing to share your sorrows as ever I should have been to share your joys," said Laura, sitting down beside him.

"Oh," groaned Cassinove, "if my sinfulness is not too great in heaven or earth in my behalf, surely this woman's goodness must be! Surely, for her sake, God will bring light out of this great darkness! Heaven will not leave her to suffer!"

"Thus they conversed together until their conference was interrupted by the opening of the cell door, and the appearance of the warden, who bowed in a lady closely veiled, and retired.

The lady threw aside her veil, and disclosed the sweet face of a friend.

"My dearest Rose!" cried Laura Elmer, rising to embrace her.

"The Duchess of Bereleigh!" exclaimed Cassinove, in surprise.

"Yes, it is I, my friends, come to see you once more. Indeed, I should have come sooner, but I have been ill; and oh! in so much trouble. You have heard about it, Miss Elmer?"

"Yes, yes, I have heard, and I should have gone to you, but sorrows—such dark sorrows as ours—make us selfish, I fear, and I have been forgetting the part of a Sister of Charity to a lonely prisoner so zealously as to leave her his time to bestow upon her friends," said Cassinove, regretfully.

"Something like that, indeed. But I consider such duties as sacred as fully to exonerate Miss Elmer. I fully expected to find her here, and I am glad to have found her."

"I am here every day, dear Rose, to be left out. But now the continual gossip of the people and the press, concerning the tragedy at Lester House, brings me to a consultation on this sad affair, and under the notice of the authorities. They hint at a cause of such murder as this, that my cheeks burn and my heart shudder. I live in the daily dread of being subpoenaed to the witness box, for the trial of the approaching trial. But if I bore this relationship to Lady Laura, would it be considered to give evidence against him."

"But would your evidence so seriously affect Cassinove?"

"It would put the seal upon his fate."

"Miss Etheridge, tell me what this testimony is, that I may judge of its importance. You may confide in me with perfect safety, for I shall never repeat your words; and even if I were capable of such a breach of confidence, I could do no harm since 'hearsay' is no legal evidence."

"It was a fierce and bitter quarrel between Ferdinand Cassinove and Sir Vincent Lester on the evening preceding the murder of the baronet," said Laura, in a low and shuddering voice.

"I see, I see, my poor child! I see it all! Tell me, dear, what you know? What would you have me to do?"

"Doctor, you are a Christian gentleman—you believe in effectual prayer and in providential aid. Go home, pray

CHAPTER XXXII.

It was the morning of the day of the trial—the trial, par excellence, of the century—the trial of Ferdinand Cassinove, for the murder of his employer, Sir Vincent Lester, one of the richest commoners of England.

All London was talking of it. It formed the subject of conversation at every breakfast-table, dinner-table, every shop in the city, as well as at the chambers of Messrs. Clagett and Palmer, counsel for the prisoner, and at the cell at Newgate, where Ferdinand Cassinove awaited his summons to the courtroom.

At an unusually early hour, a crowd, composed in part of the most respectable citizens of London collected in front of the Old Bailey to await the opening of the doors.

Rightly as much as possible these every three hours. But I am here to-day for an especial purpose. Therefore, if you please, I will be placed in the cell with the prisoner, and I will explain myself presently," said Laura Elmer, gravely.

The young duchess looked from one to the other for an explanation.

"You are here involuntarily to witness a marriage," said Laura Elmer.

Rose looked more perplexed than before.

Miss Elmer does not wish to be called as a witness on my approaching trial. To prevent this, she is about to bestow upon me her hand. Tell me, madam, for you are a disinterested witness, am I not doing a great wrong to accept so vast a sacrifice?" said Cassinova.

"But I do not understand," said Rose.

"She would immolate herself for the bare chance of saving my life," began Cassinove, but Laura Elmer laid her hand before his lips to stop his farther speech, and turning to the the duchess, briefly, in a few words explained the urgent necessity for the immediate marriage.

"You are right, dear Laura; I feel that you are quite right, although not one in a hundred would think it right, and not one in a thousand dare to do it even if they thought so," said Rose, generously.

"I am pleased that you agree with me, dear," replied Miss Elmer.

"And I am very much pleased that I happen to be here to support you, dear Laura! You required a woman's presence, now, did you not? Say so, to please me, dear Laura."

"I can say so with great sincerity, my dear Rose. Indeed, need the presence of some woman friend, and I am most happy to have yours," replied Miss Elmer.

Once more they were interrupted by the opening of the cell door and the entrance of Dr. Clark and Mr. Watson, who were ushered in by the turnkey, who immediately withdrew.

Dr. Clark recognized the Duchess of Bereleigh with surprise and pleasure, bowed, and presented the Rev. Mr. Watson.

The little party quite filled up the narrow cell.

"The officers of the prison seem to think that you are holding a levee this morning, Cassinove," said the doctor, wondering what it is about. I did not think proper to volunteer explanation," said Dr. Clark, cheerfully.

"Young lady," said the minister, approaching Miss Elmer and speaking in a low voice, "is this step that you are about to take well considered?"

"Yes sir, it is well considered," answered Laura Elmer, gravely and firmly.

"In the name of Heaven, then, I must proceed. Stand up, if you please," said the minister, opening his book.

Cassinove arose, and led Laura Elmer before him.

Dr. Clark took his place beside Cassinove, and the two principal stood by Laura Elmer.

The marriage ceremony was commenced with the usual formulas. When they came to the question, "Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?"

"I do," said the venerable Dr. Clark, taking the hand of the bride, and placing it in the hand of the bridegroom.

When they reached the point where the ring was required, Rose arose, and drawing forth a diamond ring, gave it to the minister, who placed it on the finger, offered it for the purpose, saying:

"Keep it, dear Laura, it is the emblem of truth."

The ring was placed upon her finger, the vows were made, the prayers offered, the benediction bestowed, and the marriage ceremony concluded.

After the cordial clasping of hands, and earnestly breathed good wishes, their friends departed, leaving the newly-married pair together.

At the usual hour for closing, Laura took leave of Cassinove, and returned to her lodgings. She had soon good reason to know that her marriage had not taken place one hour too soon.

The next morning, while she was preparing to commence a long day's watch over a sick lady, a servant came to her room, who said that a gentleman had called, and sent up his card, which bore the name of Mr. Darnley.

"Tell the gentleman that I am engaged, and cannot see him to-day," said Laura, without looking at the card.

"He says, miss, that he has a message from Mr. Cassinove, and that you will see him," said the servant.

"Show him up, then," said Laura, hastily.

The man bowed and withdrew.

Laura, with a beating heart, awaited the coming of the messenger.

He was ushered in, and Laura, with a sinking heart, recognized the man who had been employed by Mr. Cassinove to find the missing witness, Thugsen, alias Roberts, alias Rayburne.

"Pardon me, madam, for intruding upon you at this hour, but I have a message from Mr. Cassinove, which I was instructed to deliver as soon as possible," said the man, bowing.

"Proceed, sir," said Laura, faintly.

"Mr. Cassinove desires me to say that he has found the witness for the defense, and that he will be in court to-morrow morning," said the man.

"Thank you, sir," said Laura, faintly.

The man bowed and withdrew.

Laura sank back in her chair, pale and faint.

"Oh, my God!" she exclaimed, "what will be the end of this?"

CHAPTER XXXIII.

At seven o'clock the judges entered the courtroom, and took their places on the bench.

And soon after the order was given to bring in the prisoner.

All eyes were now turned in the direction of the door through which the prisoner was expected to enter.

And in a few minutes Ferdinand Cassinove made his appearance, walking between two police officers.

He was very pale, his figure erect, his glance keen, and his bearing proud. His face was pale only in contrast to the darkness of the short beard that waved around his lofty brow, and the sable suit of clerical cloth that formed his usual costume.

Behind him walked Laura, clothed in deep mourning, and leaning on the arm of her husband, Dr. Clark.

Laura was accommodated with a seat near the prisoner's counsel.

Dr. Clark unwillingly took his place among the witnesses on the part of the Crown.

And Ferdinand Cassinove was ushered into the prisoner's dock. He looked around himself, and the sea of faces upturned to his; no friendly look among them; the hundreds of eyes fixed upon him; no kindly glance for them. Curiosity, horror and vindictiveness was the expression of the multitude.

Wearily, despairingly, Cassinove turned from this black ocean to the group of witnesses for the defense, who were seated on his right hand. There were but few in number, consisting of his venerable pastor, his old schoolmaster, and his old nurse, all persons who bore excellence of his character from his childhood up. With these Cassinove was among the friendliest of greetings, dressed in deep mourning, and looking worn and wasted as though from illness. Cassinove extended Mr. Palmer, his junior counsel, and inquired:

"How came Colonel Hastings hither?"

"He presented himself this morning as a voluntary witness for the defense. He has just arrived from Baden-Baden, where his constitution received a terrible shock in the death of his only and idolized son."

"The death of his son? Mr. Albert Hastings? When did he die?" inquired Cassinove, in surprise.

"About a month ago."

"Was he ever ill?"

"In body, not an hour. In mind, always, I fear! He blew his brains out after losing four thousand pounds at a card table in Baden-Baden. It has broken his father's heart, as you may see. The old man is ill for many days after the catastrophe, and has only just arrived in England, to serve you, if he can, my friend."

The attorney-general proceeded to open the case for the Crown by stating that the prisoner at the bar was murderer for which the prisoner at the bar had been indicted, commented upon it in the strongest and most atrocious nature of homicide in general, and of his murder in particular, which, according to the vices of ingratitude, hypocrisy and cowardice. Wherein the prisoner, for years, but only for the crime, had heinously murdered his own benefactor—not in broad daylight, face to face, but in the darkness of night, but "in the dead waste and middle of the night," when all the household, his kinsmen, friends, and dependents repose, the cowardly assassin stole to the bedchamber of Sir Vincent Lester, and there, in the absence of all witness in that hour of darkness, while the victim lay helpless in sleep—"innocent and unsuspecting danger" into the heart of his benefactor.

The clerk then called the name of "Clara, Lady Lester."

And there was a general rising and craning of necks to catch a glimpse of the baronet's widow, as she moved from her seat among the witnesses and went forward to the table of the stand, where her stout, black-robed, deeply-veiled form stood revealed to all eyes.

After having the usual duty administered to her, she was requested to look at the prisoner, and turned to meet him full, dark eyes of vindictive fire with a look of anxious integrity upon her. This was the first time she had been in the presence of the murderer, and his expression of countenance evidently surprised her.

Examined by counsel both wondered what Lady Lester would have to testify in regard to the murder, when they knew that she was not in the house soundly through the whole of the tragic scenes of that fatal first of October. It was then that she began to speak.

"I am the widow of the deceased. I know the prisoner at the bar; he filled the position of tutor to my late husband's son, and resided in our house for nearly twelve months."

"Will your ladyship inform the jury what seemed to be the state of feeling between the disciple and preceptor?" inquired the counsel for the Crown.

"At first the deceased and the prisoner appeared to entertain for each other as cordial a friendship as could possibly exist between persons of unequal condition, and therefore unequal friends, that friendship cooled, until, at length, it changed to a bitter enmity."

"Will your ladyship tell the court how this enmity exhibited itself?"

"In many daily acts of mutual annoyance, in angry looks, words and deeds of hatred."

"Your ladyship will please be specific in the statement of these mutual acts of mutual annoyance."

"In the first place, Sir Vincent Lester complained that the attentions paid by Mr. Cassinove to a young person residing in the capacity of governess in our family, Miss Elmer, were displeasing to my late husband, and that he considered them—"

"Silence!" said the examination of Lady Lester proceeded.

"This was one of the ways in which the prisoner annoyed the deceased. Will your ladyship tell us now, in what manner the deceased annoyed the prisoner?" questioned the counsel.

"By throwing every obstacle he could in the way of Mr. Cassinove's conversation with the governess."

"What motive do you suppose the deceased had for this course of conduct toward the prisoner?"

This question was challenged, objected to, and ruled out.

The counsel put it in another form, and inquired:

"What was the cause of this hatred between the prisoner and the deceased?"

Here, even the cold, calm Lady Lester reddened, as she replied:

"I can testify with certainty only to the enmity; the knowledge of its origin belongs only to Him who seeth the secret heart of man."

"That will do, then, does your ladyship suppose to have been the cause?"

This question was also objected to and ruled out. After a close cross-examination, that elicited nothing more than a reiteration of the first testimony, Lady Lester was permitted to withdraw.

Sir Ruthven Lester was now called to the stand, and duly sworn. After which he corroborated the testimony of his mother, but added nothing new.

The next witness called was Soper, the valet of the late baronet. He testified that on the evening preceding the murder the deceased had come down from the schoolroom in a great passion, saying that Cassinove had deeply offended him, and should not remain in the house another twenty-four hours; whereupon the deceased went to his chamber, and waited on him until he got into bed, when he said, "If I live until morning I will turn that fellow out of doors." Witness then closed and secured the window shutters, so that the deceased could possibly enter the room, and left his master to repose. That was the last time he saw the deceased alive.

Cross-examination elicited no further testimony, and Soper was directed to withdraw.

While this witness was being examined, Laura Elmer was seated with her nearer to Cassinove, and now sat at the corner of the dock, where she could converse in a low tone with the prisoner, or she knew what was next coming, and wished to be beside him to comfort him by word and look.

Watson, the butler, was now called to the stand. Again there was a lifting of all heads and craning of all necks to get sight of this most important witness, who was most interesting as the friend of the prisoner and the deceased. On the night of the murder, I was sitting up late in my office, adjoining the pantry, engaged in making out my accounts, when, it might be about two o'clock in the morning, I was startled by the cries of 'murder! murder! murder! murder!' four times, only the echo of the last seemed strangled in the throat of the one that cried, and then followed a deep, ominous silence. I threw down my pen, and rushed upstairs, toward my master's room, whence those cries seemed to to proceed, and there I burst open the door, and found my master, wounded and dying, yet grappling with a death-grip the collar of the prisoner, who stood over him with a blood-stained, dripping dagger in his hand. As soon as my master saw me he exclaimed, feebly:

"'Seize him! Seize him! He has murdered me, the villain!'

"And by this time the chamber was filled with my fellow-servants, who had been aroused by the cries of murder, and hurried to the spot as quickly as they could spring from their beds and throw on their clothes.

"I said, 'In the name of Heaven, what is all this?'

"'He has murdered me—he, he, the wretch!' exclaimed my master, who immediately fell back and expired."

"Did the deceased mention the prisoner by name?" inquired the counsel for the Crown.

"No, sir."

"Did the deceased appear collected and self-possessed when making this dying declaration?"

"No; he seemed wild and distracted."

This witness was now subjected to a severe cross-examination, which failed to shake his very important evidence.

The other domestics were all examined in turn, and all corroborated the testimony of the butler as to the position in which the deceased and the prisoner were found on the occasion of the discovery of the murder, as well as the testimony of Sir Ruthven and Lady Lester in regard to the enmity that existed between the tutor and the late baronet.

Dr. Clark was then called to the stand and examined as to the condition of the body when found, the nature of the wound, etc. And with the conclusion of his testimony, the evidence for the Crown closed.

And the court adjourned until nine o'clock the next day.

The crowd immediately dispersed, commenting, as they went out, upon the nature of the evidence and the prospects of the prisoner.

"Not a hope in the world remains for him," said one.

"The clearest case I ever knew in my life," said another.

And all agreed that the guilt of the prisoner was abundantly proved; that the defense would be a mere form, and that his conviction and execution were as certain as any future events could possibly be.

And through all this crowd of unpitying faces, and Babel of accusing and condemning tongues, passed the prisoner in charge of the sheriff, and his beautiful wife leaning, as before, on the arm of Dr. Clark. As they walked the short distance between the courthouse and the prison, Laura found herself beside Cassinove, who said, in a low voice:

"What a case they have made out against me! And yet I hope even more proved enmity between Sir Vincent and myself, which, Heaven knows, existed not on his side. And they have proved this without your evidence. Alas! dearest, you have sacrificed yourself in vain."

"No, not in vain; if my affection and presence can sustain you through this trial, you—you—will be rewarded," murmured his devoted wife.

As the hour for closing the prison had arrived, the party paused at the door at the gates, and returned to her lodgings. And as soon as she had entered the parlor, she sank down upon a chair, threw herself upon the bed and gave way, in floods of tears, to the pent-up sorrow of the whole day.

She had not had one drink had passed her lips that day; body as well as mind was utterly exhausted.

There was none to comfort her; as kind hand to bring her a refreshing cup of tea, to restore fainting nature; not even a kind word or look or word of hope to revive failing courage. She was utterly alone in her anguish. Could she have known this she would have left her luxurious palace and come and brought Laura away from these dreary lodgings, or she remained to console her in them. But the young duchess had only seen Laura herself once in her life, and could not know at the miserable poverty, want and loneliness into which her gifted friend had fallen.

Thus Laura was alone in her anguish; and should she have had it otherwise, while Cassinove was alone in his prison cell.

She passed the night in paroxysms of grief, alternating with fits of prostration, during one of which her nature's swooning than healthful sleep. Near morning, after a paroxysm more violent than any preceding one, she fell into a stupor deeper than usual, so that it was late in the morning when she awoke from this last sweet or sleep—from deep unconsciousness to sudden and piercing realization of all the misery of her situation. But the necessity of self-control and self-exertion was imminent. She felt that she must go to the prison, and, hopeless and comfortless herself, speak words of hope and comfort to her husband.

She arose, but found herself so feeble as to be near falling again. With a great effort she bathed her face, smoothed her hair and arranged her disordered dress. And then she sank down in her chair.

Some refreshments were absolutely necessary to sustain nature through the coming hours. After some slight hesitation, she rang her bell, knowing very well that her landlady, who was also maid-of-all work to her lodgers, would answer it.

There are some creatures bearing the human form, yet so much lower in nature than the lowest animal, that "it were base flattery to call them brutes." Of such was Laura's landlady, with whom she dreaded coming in contact, as a refined and sensitive nature must dread collision with the coarse and coarse and vulgar one.

These base and bitter sorrows, that had so touched Laura's heart, had discrowned her of much of that queenliness of look and manner that had once commanded homage from all who approached her. Perhaps, also, Mrs. Brown, the landlady, was not to be impressed by anything more subtle than material agency. Be that as it may, whatever the reason, she had fallen into service for her lodging, she had suffered much from the coarse insolence of her landlady, and had entered the service of the deepest apprehension when she rang the bell that was to bring this animal to her presence.

The landlady entered—a tall, stout, vulgar woman, with a red face, bloated cheeks and small, watery eyes. She entered with a swaggering walk and an insolent air, demanding harshly:

"What do you want?"

"A cup of coffee, if you please," answered Laura, with a low voice and averted face.

"You'd better pay for what you has had before you ask for more."

"I will certainly pay you for all if you will be kind enough to bring me the coffee."

"I'll not do it until you pays for what you has had."

"I have not a penny in the house now."

"Then, you've no business to be in the house without a penny. Such as wears dimont rings ain't no call to want money," said the woman, fixing her coarse eyes upon the ring that Laura had given her as a wedding ring.

At sight of the ring Laura, for the sake of the giver, would have hesitated to part with the gift; but now time pressed, and she must have refreshment and proceed at once to the prison to comfort Cassinove. She drew the ring from her finger and handed it to the woman, saying:

"Here, take it and keep it as security until I pay you, only bring me the coffee."

"The promptitude with which Laura offered the ring excited the suspicions of the woman, who, like all vulgar natures, piqued herself upon being "sharp."

"No, I'll not take it; it may be a piece of glass set in brass for what I know, and not worth twopence."

For answer Laura held the ring out, turning it so that the morning sunlight until it burned and flashed until the living rays of light leaped from its centre.

"Well, then, and it may be a real dimont, for what I know; but, even so, how did you come by it? There is waits jailbirds is to be suspicioned; and I never received no stolen goods in my life."

"Very well, then be good enough to leave the room," said Laura, in a calm, commanding tone, that enforced obedience even from that stolid creature.

Laura then put on her mantle and bonnet, and though very feble, went downstairs, walked to the short distance to Giltspur street, where she remembered to have seen a pawnbroker's shop, and entered it. The rude reproach of the landlady had done her this service—it had suggested the means of procuring the necessaries, that would never else have presented itself to her mind. At another time and in other circumstances she would have shrunk from the idea of entering a pawnbroker's shop, but now heavier sorrows and keener anxieties absorbed her whole soul. She entered the shop, where a little, dark, hook-nosed, glittered-eyed man stood behind the counter.

"How much will you give me for this ring?" said Laura, advancing and laying it upon the counter.

"Eh; mine shole, vere did you get dish?" exclaimed old Issachar, pouncing upon the ring and glaring upon it with ravenous eyes.

"No, matter, so that it is mine, and I have a right to sell it," said Laura.

"Do you want to shell it?" asked the pawnbroker, with difficulty concealing his eagerness.

"No, only to pledge it. How much will you advance me upon it?"

"Eh, mine shole, I vill tell you vort sho much, either, now I lookish at it," said Issachar, recovering his composure and cruelty.

"Very well; name the sum that you are willing to advance upon it."

"Eh, mine shole, dish ring is very scarsh. I will advance five pounds on it."

The ring was worth an hundred guineas, at least, but Laura had not too much experienced with trouble to chaffer with the fellow, so she said:

"Very well, I will take it," and accept for the ring, so that I may redeem it as soon as I can."

Issachar immediately handed her the money and a ticket, and eagerly took and locked up the ring, which he considered a great prize to himself.

Laura left the shop, returned to her lodgings, and rang again for the landlady. That animal swiftly made her appearance.

"How much do I owe you?" inquired Laura.

"Two-pun-ten, and I reckon you'll never see me less," said the woman, bluntly.

"Here are three pounds. Bring me the change and my coffee immediately, for I have not much time to spare, and before her lodger a comfortable breakfast.

A Free Trip To Kingston

It's a new idea to bring shoppers to Kingston at our expense. But we want to encourage out-of-town people to do their Christmas shopping earlier this year and get the advantage of better selections along with the trip to Kingston at our expense.

The Reputation of This Store

Is a guarantee that the proposition is thoroughly genuine—with nothing to suggest anything but a straight forward business concession to our out-of-Town friends.

Railroad Fares Refunded.

During November and December we will refund one round trip fare from any place within a radius of twenty-five miles of Kingston to each individual spending not less than twenty-five dollars at this Store. Shorter distances in proportion to mileage such as

Twenty miles, one round trip on twenty dollar purchase,
Fifteen miles, " " fifteen dollar purchase, etc.

We want people to see for themselves the enormous stocks we carry. They can believe the evidence of their own eyes, and we're willing to abide by any comparison they can make.

OUR CHRISTMAS NOVELTIES are all ready for your inspection.

REMEMBER this free transportation is confined to November and December, and is intended for quick acceptance.

Christmas Silk Waists BY MAIL.

Worth $4.00--Yours for $2.35

This Offer is Good Only for Two Weeks from Date of this Paper.

Just such Waists as these are actually sold in Kingston day after day as "extra specials for $2.95 each"—and rightly said to be worth $4. But, by a chance, which we need not explain, we are able to offer one (only) to each mail order customer for the sum of two dollars and thirty-five cents. And more than that, we will prepay the postage and send the Waist by registered mail, so that you can't fail to get it in good condition. The illustration herewith is not exactly like the Waists, but nearly so—they are prettier, and, if possible, even more stylish. If you have some friend away from home, you could not remember her in a better way than by sending her one of these Waists. Tell us her address, and we'll send it direct to her—safe delivery guaranteed. Here is a detailed description of the Waist:

Black or White	The Silk used is best quality Japan Wash Silk. The front is made with wide hemstitched tucks and clusters of pin-tucks running up to the shoulder. The sleeves are also finished with small and wide hemstitched cuff filled with small pin-tucks. Black and colour to match. These Waists are well worth $4.00, but you can have your choice of sizes 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42—black or white—each only : : : : : :	$2.35
Sizes 32 to 42

Be sure and say which size you want, and whether black or white. Send money (two dollars and thirty-five cents) by Post Office Order or Express Money Order with your letter. And remember, that only one will be sold to each customer, and that this offer is good only for two weeks from the date of this paper.

If You Are Not Satisfied with Your Waist Say So, and We'll Return Your Money.

NEWBURGH.

A big fire was narrowly averted on Saturday morning. Shortly after 8 o'clock fire was discovered in the block owned by Mrs. Ferguson and occupied as a restaurant by Mr. Pinkerton. The alarm was given and the engines began to play on the blaze, but a few moments more of delay would have been fatal to the whole block and also the Methodist church. Mrs. Young left on Tuesday for her home before leaving for Kilsmeal. During the year Miles Young has been here she has proven herself a capable organist and an energetic worker in church work, and her many friends will wish her every success and happiness in her new home.

Mrs. Lambert, the new organist of the Methodist church, arrived on Monday.

Mrs. Ryan entertained on Tuesday afternoon.

Hubert Ryan, Queen's University, Kingston, spent Sunday at his home here.

Miss Evelyn Grange, Ottawa, is visiting Miss Mary Beeman.

Mr and Mrs. Roger attended the funeral of the late Fred Sager, Desoronto, on Monday.

Miss Bertha Benson, Brantford, is visiting her aunt, C. W. Dunham.

H. Ryan is shipping large quantities of ice to Kingston.

C. W. B. Moore has finished painting C. H. Fader's carriage works recently.

Miss Lorena Patterson spent Sunday with friends in Village.

The first meeting of the Literary Club for the N.H.S. was held in Forin's Hall on Friday afternoon. A large number of the village and number of ex-students who had thrown psychology for the winter, attended and supplied the ingredients to the witches' cauldron and returned to the scene of the old school room for a bite after the meeting. A good programme.

Miss Saturday, to Mr. and Mrs. Simon F. Fitzmurtin, a son.

Miss Josephine Ferguson, of Kingston, was in town on Tuesday.

Miss Ethel Bowerman is the Methodist church on Thursday evening, Nov. 29th, assisted by soprano, Mr. Cummings, the tenor soloist, and Miss Chown, the elocutionist, come highly recommended, and an interesting time is promised to all who come. Admission, 25 cents.

Mr. and Mrs. Fraemore, Napanee, spent Monday at W. B. Dunn's.

Miss Ethel Mills and Mrs. Frank Fiskle spent Wednesday afternoon in Yarker.

Miss Elsie Moore, of the Napanee Business College, was home last week, through illness.

The Newburgh Dramatic Club have in hand an excellent play entitled "The Ladies' Guild Concert in Yarker, Ont." The Club will present their successors of two seasons, "My 12 Years," and "Under the Shadow of the Sword." The musical talent at the Public Hall concert will also assist. The farces are the best pair in the company's repertoire, and it should score another hit in Yarker.

SHORTER HOURS.

Editor Beaver:

Dear Sir,—At the Council meeting on Monday night Mr. Kimmerly, Chairman of the Fire, Water and Light committee, stated that they were well pleased with the engineer and fireman at the power house complaining of the long hours they are compelled to be on duty, and three cold water on the matter by saying that he had often worked that long himself, and thought they were well paid for it.

Now the engineer and fireman go on duty at three o'clock in the afternoon and remain on duty until next morning, seven days a week, a mere matter of 112 hours a week, 448 hours for a 30 day month. The engineer receives $60.00 a month or 13½ cents an hour. The fireman receives $35 a month or nearly 7¾ cents an hour. Since the power is found to be required in the place of the Fire, Water and Light committee will have to see that it is better paid fully expected that the other members of the committee, Comes Simpson and Graham, will do their duty.

GRAVEL ROAD.

Much sympathy is expressed for Mr. and Mrs. John Thompson, who sustained a severe loss on Friday morning last. Their dwelling house was totally destroyed by fire, it having originated in the chimney and was soon enveloped. Very few of the contents of the house were saved, the furniture and was soon a wreck of ashes. The loss is partly covered by insurance.

Miss Jessie McNeill has returned home, after a lengthy visit with friends in Toronto.

Mr. W. H. Oliver and his party have returned from their hunting excursion where they spent the past two weeks in the woods. They were successful by capturing a fine deer.

THE COMING ELECTIONS.

The Editor of The Beaver:

Dear Sir,—As the time is near when the ratepayers must elect representatives for the coming year, the time seems opportune for the electors to take an active interest in securing men of the right kind to fill the various offices.

The present council has come in for considerable criticism, some of which, no doubt, was deserved, some was unjust. At any rate the council was the choice of the electors, and, if the selection was wise, the electors have themselves to blame. If the standard now set shows that those who could better fill the offices, either from fear of personal loss or from indifference, refrain from encounter hostile criticism and ingratitude decline to assume the responsibilities of office.

There is no doubt that the acceptance of offre does entail considerable loss and sacrifice in many men, and time, with the disinclination to engage in the unpleasant details of an election campaign, prevents many from accepting nomination.

On the other hand everyone is interested in securing honest and efficient conduct of public affairs, and everyone reaps benefits from the public service, those who possess qualifications for office should at some time to make sacrifices for the public good.

To me it appears that the only remedy is for men of ability and standing to be willing to allow their names to go before the electors as candidates for council. In this manner some such men would accept office if they felt that there was a real demand for their services, and if their names could be placed before the electors without their having to bring themselves forward as candidates.

Now as to practical remedies, I would suggest that those of the electors who wish to elevate the standard of the council should either by public meeting or otherwise sign requisitions to several men as they wish to accept nomination, and that such requisitions be as largely signed as possible and presented to the proper parties.

The signing of such should not be considered as binding on any signer to either vote for or promote the candidature of all or any of the names on the list.

The next important consideration is to get the electors to the polls so that the elected may represent the wish of the electors; and to that end the names of these requisitions should, on election day, be posted to see that every vote possible be polled by the friends of the voter proposed to support for I hold that the man whose name is on the most electors' list by getting only his own supporters to the polls and by making it difficult for supporters of others to do so, or by other strictly methods, is totally unfit to hold public office.

Yours truly,

PARMA.

We are very sorry to chronicle the sad death of Mr. Samuel Dorland. He had been ailing all summer, but was not confined to bed until a much worse than usual, but on Saturday evening, Nov. 17th, he was seized with a severe attack of the brain. This was caused by the blood leaving the heart, and he became unconscious and remained in this unconscious state till his death which occurred on Wednesday, 21st inst. Deceased was a regular attendant at the Methodist church, Hay Bay, and as a friend and neighbor was highly respected. He was 56 years old, and leaves a widow, but no family. We extend our heartfelt sympathy to Mrs. Dorland in her sad bereavement.

GOING AHEAD.

George Mills & Co., the Kingston Furriers, say that in all their 28 years experience never before were they so busy as they are this present year. Like all other departments, they send out a staff of travelling salesmen with their complete outfits. Last week this up-to-date firm had on the road 10 of which 6 were living in British Columbia. Several of these have visited all over Canada and have purchased fur-lined coats from "Kingston's Famous Fur Store." Why? A Free Trip To Kingston

It's a new idea to bring shoppers to Kidgston at our expense. But we want to encourage out-of-town people to do their Christmas shopping earlier this year and get the advantage of better selections along with the trip to Kingston at our expense.

The Reputation of This Store

Is a guarantee that the proposition is thoroughly genuine—with nothing to suggest anything but a straight forward business concession to our out-of-Town friends.

Railroad Fares Refunded.

During November and December we will refund one round trip fare from any place within a radius of twenty-five miles of Kingston to each individual spending not less than twenty-five dollars at this Store. Shorter distances in proportion to mileage such as

Twenty miles, one round-trip on twenty dollar purchase,
Fifteen miles, " " fifteen dollar purchase, etc.

We want people to see for themselves the enormous stocks we carry. They can believe the evidence of their own eyes, and we're willing to abide by any comparison they can make.

OUR CHRISTMAS NOVELTIES are all ready for your inspection.

REMEMBER this free transportation is confined to November and December, and is intended for quick acceptance.

Christmas Silk Waists BY MAIL.

Worth $4.00---Yours for $2.35

This Offer is Good Only for Two Weeks from Date of this Paper.

Just such Waists as these are actually sold in Kingston day after day as "extra specials for $2.95 each"—and rightly said to be worth $4. But, by a chance, which we need not explain, we are able to offer one (only) to each mail order customer for the sum of two dollars and thirty-five cents. And more than that, we will prepay the postage and send the Waist by registered mail, so that you can't fail to get it in good condition. The illustration herewith is not exactly like the Waists, but nearly so—they are prettier, and, if possible, even more stylish. If you have some friend away from home, you could not remember her in a better way than by sending her one of these Waists. Tell us her address, and we'll send it direct to her—safe delivery guaranteed. Here is a detailed description of the Waist:

POSTPAID BY REGISTERED MAIL.

Black or White
Sizes 32 to 42

The Silk used is best quality Japan Wash Silk. The front is made with wide hemstitched tucks and clusters of pin-tucks running off to the shoulders. The sleeves are very full and wide, with 3-inch cuff filled with. Three pin-tucks. Back and collar to match. These Waists are well worth $4.00, and we have four choice of sizes 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42—black or white—each only $2.35

Be sure and say which size you want, and whether black or white. Send money (two dollars and thirty-five cents) by Post Office Order or Express Money Order—with your letter. And remember, that only one will be sold to each customer, and that this offer is good only for two weeks from the date of this paper.

If You Are Not Satisfied with Your Waist Say So, and We'll Return Your Money.

NEWBURGH.

A big fire was narrowly averted on Saturday evening. Shortly after six o'clock Wm. Cole, Dundas st., noticed smoke coming from C. H. Fralick's carriage works. Two gallons of water put out the blaze, but what a fire insurance policy would have been fatal as the building is adjacent to the blacksmith shop.

Miss Young left on Tuesday for Ottawa, where she will spend the winter. Miss Young has been a capable organist and an energetic worker in church and Sunday school, and we will wish her every success and, happiness in her new home.

Mrs. Lambert, the new organist of the Methodist church, arrived on Monday.

Mrs. Ryan entertained on Tuesday afternoon.

Hubert Ryan, Queen's University, Kingston, spent Sunday at his home here.

Miss Evelyn George, Ottawa, is visiting Miss Mary Dennison.

Mr. and Mrs. Sager attended the funeral of the late Fred Sager, Deseronto, on Monday.

Miss Ethel Thompson, Brantford, is visiting her uncle, J. W. Courtney.

C. H. Fralick is shipping large quantities of ice fowls.

E. B. Moore has finished painting the new carriage warerooms.

Miss Lorena Patterson returned home on Monday.

The first meeting of the Literary Society of the Epworth League was held on Friday afternoon. A large number from the village, a number of ex-students who had thrown psychology to the winds, and returned to legalize to the winds, and returned to their old love, and an interesting time was spent, enjoyed an interesting programme.

Born, on Saturday, to Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Hepworth, a son.

The Postoffice Inspector, of Kingston, was in town on Tuesday.

Don't forget the concert in the Methodist church on Thursday evening next, under Ladies' Aid auspices. Mr. Cunningham, the tenor soloist, and Miss Chown, the elocutionist, come highly recommended, and an interesting time is promised to all who come. Admission, 25 cents.

Mrs. Ben. Pasmore, Napanee, spent Monday at W. B. Dunn's.

Mrs. Hennen, Mrs. Ryan and Mrs. Pinkle spent Wednesday afternoon in Yarker.

Miss Elsie Moore, of the Napanee Model School, was home last week, through illness.

The Newburgh Dramatic Club have been engaged to give the programme at the Lennox Guild Concert in Yarker, on Dec. 7th. The Club will present their successes of the season, "My Lord in Livery" and "The Boots at the Swan." The musical talent at the recent Public Library concert will also be on hand, and an interesting part in the company's repertoire, and it should score another hit in Yarker.

SHORTER HOURS.

Editor Beaver:

Dear Sir,—At the Council meeting on Monday night Mr. Kimmerly, Chairman of the Fire, Water and Light committee, brought up the matter of the engineer and fireman at the power house complaining of the long hours they are compelled to be on duty, and threw cold water on the matter by saying that he had often worked that long himself, and thought they were well paid.

Now the engineer and fireman go on duty at three o'clock in the afternoon and work until seven the next morning, seven days a week, a mere matter of 112 hours a week or 480 hours for a 30 day month. The engineer receives $75 per month or 12 1-2 cents an hour. The fireman receives $45 per month or nearly 7 1-2 cents an hour. Is that being well paid for work in that position? Decency of ours?

I do not understand the matter correctly the men are not complaining of hours, it is the wages. The fireman working 16 hours out of 24 hours, with enough time left to eat and sleep.

Of a cold stormy morning, they go home at seven o'clock. As they have to report for duty at three o'clock or before, I am compelled to seek rest and thus are unable to attend to business. Hence I am quite utterly impossible to attend service. If the workmen were charged for down cousin in the time of slavery days, this would never have been written. Do the people of Napanee wish their men to work for such wages? If the chairman wishes to be economical, he I have no objection, but on extra man was left in the hands of the Fire, Water and Light committee with power to act. It is to be hoped that fully expected of the committee. Gowan, Kingsmon and Graham, will do their duty.

In Womanly Ailments and Weaknesses

Dr. Shoop's Night Cure Soothes, Heals and Cures while the Patient Sleeps.

The best remedy which physicians know for Female Weaknesses is composed of parts of a certain white lily. To this are added other ingredients which draw out the poisons and heal the inflamed membranes. This soothing antiseptic local application is known by druggists and physicians everywhere as Dr. Shoop's Night Cure—because it cures while the patient sleeps and the morning finds the pain, the inflammation, the discharge, abated. The lives of many women are crowded of matter. They suffer, they are sick, they never know a well day—yet all this suffering and sickness is unnecessary. Every ailing woman may be made strong, may be made well, may be made happy by the use of Dr. Shoop's Night Cure. Its healthy influence is to be felt in every nerve, muscle and organ. It is the remedy for all forms of suffering women; the Shoop specialty for the discharge, the pain and the inflammation. Dr. Shoop's Night Cure will overwhelm as a Psalm of Gilead. You need not know your trouble by the name; you can give it, but remember Dr. Shoop's Night Cure is not to be relied upon in all cases of womb ulceration, falling of the womb, pains in the stomach and ovaries, leucorrhoea, displacements, congestion, irregular or painful menstruation. Ask for Dr. Shoop's Night Cure. Recommended and sold by

The Bridal Eve

Without removing her bonnet, Laura hastily drank a cup of coffee, ate a morsel of bread, and then, feeling somewhat refreshed, put the shade of a cheerful countenance over her sorrowful heart, and proceeded to the prison. She reached the cell a little before the hour that the prisoner was to be conveyed to the court. The governor was with him, but retired as soon as his wife appeared, leaving the unhappy young couple the solace of a few moments' private conference.

"How did you pass the night?" inquired Laura, affectionately, sitting down beside him on the cot.

"Well, dear love, very well," said Cassinove, assuming a more cheerful countenance than his sad heart warranted. "And you, Laura?"

"I slept until quite late this morning," she said, evasively, smiling in his face.

"That is right. To-day, dear love, must decide my fate. Can my true wife be firm?"

"Firm as a rock and true as steel! Never doubt me," replied Laura, courageously, although her heart was secretly breaking.

He pressed a kiss upon her brow, and then opened the door to admit Dr. Clark and the officers who had come to conduct him to the courthouse.

Dr. Clark greeted Lord Cassinove with great kindness. And then, as it was near nine o'clock, the party set out for the session-house. The prisoner walked between the two officers, and Laura leaned upon the arm of her venerable friend, as on the preceding day.

They found the space in front of the courthouse thronged with people, who were trying in vain to press into the building.

They found the courtroom much fuller than on the preceding day, crowded, in fact, to suffocation.

"As I am to be examined to-day for the defense, my dear, I may sit beside you, and not come on," said the good old doctor, as he supported Laura toward the upper end of the court.

As before, Cassinove was placed in the dock, where he stood pale, firm and calm, above the crowd of faces turned up to him in morbid curiosity or cruel vindictiveness. He looked before him toward the bench, and saw that the brow of the judge was stern; toward the jury-box, where the faces of the jurors were very grave; he glanced to the right, where the witnesses for the defense seemed sorrowful and despondent; to the left, where those for the prosecution appeared confident and vindictive. And then from all these bloodthirsty or despairing faces his eyes turned for rest and comfort upon the beautiful, pale brow of his devoted wife, as she sat on the bench next, entwined by the proximity of the venerable Dr. Clark.

The crier called silence in the court, and Mr. Fulmer, the junior counsel for the prisoner, arose to open the defense.

This advocate was young, ardent, enthusiastic, eloquent and armed with perfect faith in the innocence of his client and the consequent justice of his cause.

He began by reviewing the address of the Crown's counsel, and pulling to pieces with great ingenuity the enormous mass of testimony raised against his client. It was all circumstantial evidence at best, he said; a mere mountain of fog, that could not stand for a moment before the clear sunlight of his client's irreproachable character. This dying declaration of the agonized and distracted man, upon which such great stress had been laid, could not be distorted into an accusation of his client, since the name of Mr. Cassinove had not been mentioned. The dying man clung with a death-grip to the prisoner, he clung to him only as his preserver. The deportment of Cassinove when discovered at the bedside of Sir Vincent Lester was not that of detected guilt; he exhibited no surprise except a benevolent anxiety to procure medical assistance for the wounded man. Neither could there be any adequate motive on the part of Mr. Cassinove for the perpetration of so heinous a crime. The enmity said to have been observed between the prisoner and the deceased was not proved by any overt act on the part of either; the alleged enmity, therefore, existed only in the opinions of those who had testified concerning it. And, finally, Mr. Cassinove's whole life, from childhood up to the very day of the fatal duel, had been distinguished for the love and practice of truth, justice and benevolence, and they deemed the most overwhelming refutation of the heinous charge that had been brought against him. He would undertake to establish by unquestionable testimony every point that he here advanced. And he hoped and believed that the jury, after hearing this testimony, would acquit the prisoner before leaving their seats. For, in view of the Court above's irreproachable character, the slight foundation of the charge brought against him, and the strength of his cause, he would venture to claim for his client not only an honorable acquittal, but a triumphant vindication.

Merely to show the line of the defense, I have given this sketch of the advocate's opening speech—a skeleton that he filled out and clothed with all the wealth of his legal knowledge, and all the richness of his burning eloquence.

At the close of his speech, he called to the stand the Rev. Henry Wagner.

The venerable pastor advanced, and being duly sworn, testified that he had known Ferdinand Cassinove "the principioner, from his infancy up to the present moment; and had always known him as distinguished for perfect integrity, pure conscientiousness, and, above all, for a fervent benevolence that had often moved him to acts of great self-sacrifice to save others from the severe trifling sufferings. And here the venerable pastor related several touching instances which he had seen these qualities of conscientiousness and benevolence severely tested and brightly illustrated.

He withdrew from the stand amid murmurs of surprise from the spectators, whom his evidence had seriously impressed in favor of the prisoner.

Dr. Clark, the next witness, corroborated the testimony of his predecessor as to the excellence of the prisoner's moral character, and also to his appearance and manner on the night of the murder, which, witness said, were not those of a guilty man.

Many other witnesses corroborated the statement of the clergyman and the physician, among whom was Colonel Hastings, who gave his testimony with an earnestness and even solemnity that made a great impression.

The young Percy Lester was called to the stand, and again every head was lifted, and every neck strained, to get sight of the youngest son of the murdered man in the witness-box on the part of the prisoner; and murmurs of sympathy moved the crowd as they gazed upon the lad standing there in his deep mourning, with his earnest young face upturned towards the clerk who was administering the oath.

What the boy had to say was not much, and yet it made a very great impression, for he spoke with a fervent, earnest, loving faith in the prisoner's innocence, and his unvarying kindness toward every creature, and he gave many instances of that kindness.

When examined on the subject of the enmity alleged to have existed between the deceased and the prisoner, the boy said:

"There was only a coolness between my father and Mr. Cassinove; but Mr. Cassinove did not hate my father; he always respected and admired him, and taught me to reverence him."

The cross-examination of the lad only brought out this testimony with increased force.

And he closed the examination of witnesses for the defense.

The senior counsel for the prisoner arose and addressed the jury in a powerful speech, made up a review of the evidence, strengthened by sound logic, illumined by clear reason, and warmed by burning eloquence.

And at the end of an hour the advocate sat down amid murmurs of admiration.

And here rested the defense.

There was no rebutting evidence offered. The counsel for the Crown said that they were not disposed to question the previous good character of the prisoner in order to prove him capable of committing the crime which it was already abundantly proved that he had committed. They had nothing to do with the prisoner's past life; they took him up from the moment of his perpetration of the felony that had placed him at the bar; and they would only recall the attention of the jury to that indestructible mass of evidence which neither the logic of the learned counsel who had just preceded him, nor the eloquence of the talented advocate who had opened the defense, had been able to move. There stood the unfortunate lady's maid as ever—the prisoner discovered in the very attitude of assassination, with the weapon of death, drenched in his hand, held arrested in the grasp of the dying man, whose very last words accused him as his murderer. That was the fact proved by more than a dozen eyewitnesses; the fact that could not be explained away by any ingenuity of sophistry, and upon that convicting fact the prosecution would rest its case. And he resumed his seat.

Here Laura turned very pale, and dropped her face in her hands; but only for an instant; then recovering herself, she looked up in time to meet

Cassinove's anxious gaze with a shade of encouragement.

The Judge rose to charge the jury. He summed up the evidence on both sides, characterizing that of the prosecution as strong and irrefutable testimony, and that of the defense as an affecting expression of feeling and opinion on the part of the witnesses, calculated rather to move the sympathies than to convince the reason of the jury, whose duty it was to be guided by reason rather than sympathy, and to bring in their verdict in accordance with facts rather than opinions. But after hearing and well weighing the evidence on both sides of this case, if a single doubt of the prisoner's guilt clouded their judgment, he enjoined them, in the name of justice and humanity to give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt.

The Judge resumed his seat, and the jury, in charge of the deputy sheriff, retired to another room, to deliberate upon their verdict.

As the door closed upon the last receding figure, a dread silence fell upon the crowded courtroom. The shadow of the scaffold seemed to have darkened over the scene. A stifling atmosphere of mortality seemed to fill the room.

And the prisoner and his devoted wife? How bore they this hour of breathless, suffocating suspense?

Life—death—in the trembling balance of fate!

Life—death! Oh, God! If it should be life—what an infinite deliverance! what an overpowering rapture of joy! But if it should be death?

As the long-drawn agony of this hour grew heavier with every slowly-passing minute, Laura became whiter, colder, and more oppressed; her face seemed marble, her hands ice, her breath gasping; she was upon the verge of swooning.

"For the love of God, a glass of wine for my wife, quickly!" exclaimed Cassinove, leaning over the dock, and addressing an officer of the court.

The man kindly hastened away in search of the required restorative, and presently returned, bringing a glass of brandy and water—there was no wine to be got.

Dr. Clark placed the glass at the lips of Laura, and forced her to swallow a few drops, after which she gently pushed it away, saying:

"Thank you, it is over now; I will not let my courage fail again; no, I will not indeed, Dr. Clark. I will not, dear Cassinove." And she sat up.

She had need of all her firmness now, for the sudden low murmur and subdued motion of the crowded courtroom announced some event of supreme interest at hand.

She looked up, and her heart paused in its pulsations; her brain reeled, and her sight failed, as she perceived the black group of the jury solemnly re-entering the court. The scene receded from her senses; the voice of the clerk sounded distant and dreamy as he asked the question:

"Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon your verdict?"

"We have," responded the solemn voice of the foreman.

"Look upon the prisoner. Prisoner, look upon the jury."

Ferdinand Cassinove stood up and confronted the twelve men who held his fate in their hands, and fixed his eagle eyes firmly upon the face of the foreman.

The clerk of arraigns spoke:

"How say you, gentlemen of the jury, is the prisoner, Ferdinand Cassinove, guilty or not guilty of the felony with which he stands charged?"

There was an instant's pause, in which you might have heard the beating of the hundreds of hearts in that hall, and then the foreman, in a broken voice, dropped the word of doom:

"Guilty."

There was heard a woman's half-smothered shriek, and then the silence fell deeply, as before.

Then the voice of the Judge arose:

"Ferdinand Cassinove, have you aught to urge why the sentence of the court should not be pronounced upon you?"

Cassinove advanced to the front of the dock, and answered:

"Yes, my lord; I were unjust to one who bears my name, as well as to my own conscious integrity, to let that sentence pass without protestation. And I though what I have to advance will not affect that sentence in the least degree, or delay my death for an hour, still, for that lady's sake, as well as for my own, I must repeat here, at the close of my trial, what I pleaded at its commencement, and say that I am not guilty of the death of Sir Vincent Lester, so help me God, at this, my utmost need! That the judge and the jury have performed—conscientiously and honestly their duty, in accordance with the amazing weight of the circumstantial evidence against me, I freely admit; but that the circumstantial evidence has misled them into the conviction of a guiltless man, I must protest. I am guiltless of the death of Sir Vincent Lester. I said it at the commencement of my trial; I say it at the last

The Bridal Eve

Without removing her bonnet, Laura hastily drank a cup of coffee, ate a morsel of bread, and then, feeling somewhat refreshed, put the mask of a cheerful countenance over her sorrowful heart, and proceeded to the prison. She reached the cell a little before the hour that the prisoner was to be conveyed to the court. The governor was with him, but retired as soon as his wife appeared, leaving the unhappy young couple the solace of a few moments' private conference.

"How did you pass the night?" inquired Laura, affectionately, sitting down beside him on the cot.

"Well, dear love, very well," said Cassinove, assuming a more cheerful countenance than his sad heart warranted. "And you, Laura?"

"I slept until quite late this morning," she said, evasively, smiling in his face.

"That is right. To-day, dear love, must decide my fate. Can my true wife be firm?"

"Firm as a rock and true as steel! Never doubt me," replied Laura, courageously, although her heart was secretly breaking.

He pressed a kiss upon her brow, and then opened the door to admit Dr. Clark and the officers who had come to conduct him to the courthouse.

Dr. Clark greeted Laura and Cassinove with great kindness. And then, as it was near nine o'clock, the party set out for the session-house. The prisoner walked between the two officers, and Laura leaned upon the arm of her venerable friend, as on the preceding day.

They found the space in front of the courthouse thronged with people, who were trying in vain to press into the building.

They found the courtroom much fuller than on the previous day, crowded, in fact, to suffocation.

"As I am to be examined to-day for the defense, my dear," I may sit beside you, and take care of you," said the good old doctor, as he supported Laura toward the upper end of the court.

As before, Cassinove was placed in the dock, where he stood pale, firm and calm, above the crowd of faces turned up to him in morbid curiosity or cruel vindictiveness. He looked before him toward the bench, and saw that the brow of the judge was stern; toward the jurymen, where the faces of the jurors were very grave; he glanced to the right, where the witnesses for the defense seemed sorrowful and despondent; to the left, where those for the prosecution appeared confident and vindictive. And then from all these bloodthirsty or despiring faces his eyes turned for rest and comfort upon the beautiful, pale brow of his devoted wife, as she sat close to the dock, sustained by the proximity of the venerable Dr. Clark.

The crier called silence in the court, and Mr. Pelmet, junior counsel for the prisoner, arose to open the defense.

This advocate was young, ardent, enthusiastic, eloquent and armed with perfect faith in the innocence of his client and the consequent justice of his cause.

He began by reviewing the address of the Crown counsel, and picking to pieces with great ingenuity the enormous mass of testimony raised against his client. It was all circumstantial evidence at best, he said; a mere mountain of fog, that could not stand for a moment before the clear sunlight of his client's irreproachable character. The dying declaration of the agonized and distracted man, upon which such great stress had been laid, could not be distorted into an accusation of his client, since the name of Mr. Cassinove had not been mentioned. If the dying man clung with a dim instinct to the prisoner, he clung to him only as his preserver. The deportment of Cassinove when discovered at the bedside of Sir Vincent Lester was not that of detected guilt; he exhibited no agitation except a benevolent anxiety to procure medical assistance for the wounded man. Neither could there be any adequate motive on the part of Mr. Cassinove for the perpetration of so hellous a crime. The enmity said to have been observed between the prisoner and the deceased was not proved by any overt act on the part of either; the alleged enmity, therefore, existed only in the opinions of those who had testified concerning it. Finally, Mr. Cassinove's whole life, from childhood up to the very hour of his arrest, had been distinguished by the love and practice of truth, justice and benevolence, and they formed the most overwhelming refutation of the heinous charge that had been brought against him. He would undertake to establish, by unquestionable testimony, every point that he here advanced. And he hoped and believed that the jury, after hearing this evidence, would acquit the prisoner before leaving their seats.

For, in view of Mr. Cassinove's irreproachable character, the slight foundation of the charge brought against him, and the strength of his cause, he would venture to claim for his client not only an honorable acquittal, but a triumphant vindication.

Merely to show the line of the defense, I have given this sketch of the advocate's opening speech—a skeleton that he filled out and clothed with all the wealth of his legal acumen, and all the richness of his burning eloquence.

The cross-examination of the lad only brought out this testimony with increased force.

And here closed the examination of witnesses for the defense.

The senior counsel for the prisoner arose and addressed the jury in a powerful speech, similar to counsel for the evidence, strengthened by sound logic, illumined by clear reason, and warmed by burning eloquence.

And at the end of an hour he advocate sat down amid murmurs of admiration.

And here rested the defense.

There was no rebutting evidence offered. The counsel for the Crown said that they were not disposed to question the previous good character of the prisoner in order to prove him capable of committing that crime which he was already abundantly proved that he had committed. That the judge and the jury have performed—conscientiously performed—their duty, in accordance with the amazing weight of the circumstantial evidence against me, I freely admit; but that the circumstantial evidence has misled them into the conviction of a guiltless man, I must insist. I am guiltless of the death of Sir Vincent Lester. I said it at the commencement of my trial; I say it now; I shall say it in the hour of death, and on the day of judgment! My lord, I have done." And with a grave inclination of the head, Cassinove resumed his seat.

A murmur of admiration, doubt, and compassion ran through the crowd. But above this arose the voice of the crier;

"Let there be silence in the court while sentence of death is pronounced upon the prisoner."

And a silence like that of the grave fell upon the breathless assembly.

The judge then put on that solemn part of the judicial insignia, the black cap of doom, the black velvet cap, and rose from his seat. The prisoner was also directed to stand up. Cassinove arose more arose, and advanced to the front of the dock.

The judge addressed him:

"Ferdinand Cassinove, after a careful and impartial trial, you have been convicted by a jury of your peers of the heinous crime of wilful murder. It becomes, therefore, my painful duty to pronounce upon you the sentence of the law. But before passing it, I would admonish you that however you may have deluded your own guiltlessness, the weight of the evidence against you, and the atrocity of the crime with which you have been convicted, leave you not the slightest hope of pardon in this world. And I implore you, in behalf of the short space that remains, to lose no time in seeking, by repentance and confession, that Divine mercy which is never refused to the penitent sinner, however darkly guilty. The sentence of the court is that you, Ferdinand Cassinove, be taken from hence to the place from whence you came, and from thence to the place of execution, and be there hanged by the neck until you be dead, and may God, in His infinite goodness, have mercy on your soul."

And the judge sat down, overcome by his emotions.

Cassinove bowed to the bench, and then turned to see how his wife bore this decree of doom. She was standing up, pale and still, with her hands clasped, and her eyes raised to the face of her husband. The agony of suspense was past now, and the full horror of death seemed already to overshadow her.

"The blow has fallen, love; it is all over!" murmured the deep-toned voice of the young man.

"Yes, it is over; we must die! Well, what matter, since we are alone in the world, and shall leave none behind to mourn for us? And the die!"

"We, dear love?"

"Yes, we; for I have neither the power nor the will to survive you, Cassinove."

"God give you both, sweet wife, with many years of earthly usefulness and happiness, after this restless heart and brain of mine shall be calmed in death."

A CRIPPLE CURED.

HELPLESS AND BENT WITH RHEUMATISM—CURED BY DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS.

"I was a helpless cripple. I was bent in form and could not straighten myself. I suffered only means of movement at all. I tried many medicines, but they all failed. I began using Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. They cured me," says Mr. Schaw, of St. John, N.B., make the above statement after having suffered for almost eighteen months. Mr. Schaw is now a straight, hale man, strong and broad-shouldered. Like thousands of others Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have cured him after doctors, friends and all kinds of weather, just the medicine to set the rheumatic poison in the blood at work, and to overcate the terrible agonies of the disease. The severity of the attack. Mr. Schaw was lonely in my back and right legs. I had to quit work and was helpless. There was a time when I never expected to stand erect again, but Dr. Williams' Pink Pills strengthened me up again, not only that, but they made me the strong, nearly man you see me to-day. I can never describe the awful pain I suffered before I used these pills, tried many medicines and had treated many several doctors, but to no avail. My legs became so stiff that I could not straighten them. The pain was simply excruciating. Finally the doctors decided that I was incurable, and told me they could render no further assistance. I continued to suffer day and night, and then came the turning point of my life. A friend from a distance came to see me and, in talking with me, learned that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills were a great cure for rheumatism, and at once got a supply, and began to use them. The first indication that they were helping me was when the pain grew less severe. In a few weeks I never felt any swelling in my legs and hips began to leave me. Soon I was able to walk up, and then it was not long until my crutches were laid aside and I could straighten up. Then I began to go out doors and soon was able to resume my work as well as ever. Since that time I have never had any trouble with rheumatism or lame back. I can tell you my neighbors were all astonished at my cure; they had all thought I would always be a cripple."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cure rheumatism by going straight to the root of the trouble in the blood. They drive every trace of impurity and poison from the system, and in this way cure all troubles resulting from poor blood or shattered nerves, such as anæmia, indigestion, neuralgia, St. Vitus dance, nervousness, weakness and the special ailments that only girls and women know. Nerves and Teeth.

Bad nerves and bad teeth will be found to go together in an extraordinary number of cases. The hustle and bustle of our modern life, which is so trying to the nerves, has an equally detrimental effect upon the teeth.

The Unconquered Swiss.

The Swiss are the only European nation which has never been conquered in the past five centuries. Napoleon's suzerainty was only nominal.

Soap.

The origin of soap is a mystery, but we have many evidences of its antiquity. It is mentioned at least twice in the Bible, under the name of "bouth," at a period corresponding to several centuries before Christ.

Prison Books.

In prison Boethius composed his work on the consolations of philosophy and Grotius wrote his commentary on St. Matthew, with other works.

Butterflies.

The most curious thing about the butterfly is the size of the case from which the insect proceeds compared with the size of the insect's body. The case is rarely more than one inch long and a quarter of an inch in thickness; the butterfly covers a surface of nearly four inches square.

Lake Heron.

Lake Huron holds a curious record in having more islands than any other lake. It has at least 3,000. Lough Erne, in Ireland, has 360 islands.

Prussic Acid.

Prussic acid is the most rapid poison a human being can take.

A Bad Combination.

Dryden and his wife, Lady Elizabeth Howard, lived in a constant broil. She was clever, and he was sarcastic, so that their quarrels were very animated.

"Robinson Crusoe."

"Robinson Crusoe" was offered in turn to every publisher in London and refused by all. At last one bookseller, known for his specialist lives, undertook its publication and made over 1,000 guineas. It has made the fortunes of scores of publishers since its appearance.

The Muscles.

Voluntary muscles are always red; involuntary muscles are generally white, the most notable exception in the latter case being the heart.

A Queer Fish.

A quaint little fish haunts the weed tracts of the gulf stream and there builds its nest and lays its eggs, like a bird rather than a fish. This animal, the antennarius, imitates in color the weed it lives in and, like the chameleon, constantly changes its color.

Builders' hardware of almost every description. Paint, Oil and Glass, Cement. MADDLE & WILSON.

Vanilla Flavoring Free.

At the Savoy you can get hot meals and lunches, oysters, hot Beef tea, chocolate and cocoa, at all hours. Just west of the Campbell House. W. C. BRUTON, Proprietor.

The election for municipal purposes takes place on the first Monday of the new year. This year the day is January 6th, nearly a week or two after Christmas. There are some places the suggestion has been made that the municipal ends coincide with the time of taking office, but we cannot see any reason for such a change. The election will be held every year on New Years day, so in case Jan. 1st happens on Sunday, to hold the elections on the 2d.

The Savoy is the right place to get a good meal or hot drink, at all hours. CHART BRUTON.

ANGER.

Getting angry never does any good; it always does harm. Even the gracious-tempered can lose reasonate and pity, are not free from outbursts of anger, but they never cause more than a momentary debasement. It always debases always unless there is strength of the intellect to conceal it. Of the intellect, fortune is, the weakest-minded of mankind possesses it, and never ever feels himself naively contemptible, it is when he has allowed himself to give vent to his feelings under the excitement of passion. Of all passions, of ladies and gentlemen; there is a self-inflicted punishment, a sinner greater than he can bear, and gladly would he hide himself in the neighborhood, if possible, of a slide away into the darkest corner. Anger is a rough passion, of fire on the inner heart of one who is in a tearing passion, and is express in nothing; only bad words, and deeds and it will almost kill him, for he has a consequuence of fright that feel your self when you hear him despises him. No one can feel it at home with a churlish, crusty, ill-natured person, for there is no reliance to be placed on his moods. He may be in the best possible humor one instant, and the next be literally raving. There is an instinctive aversion against having anything to do with passionate people. It is unpleasant to have any business arrangements with them. To patronize the cheerful, the good-hearted and obliging, who is willing to accommodate, and is ever ready to do a good turn, is a business point of view, the touchy man is always at a disadvantage. Passionate-ness does not invite custom, pays no debts, makes creditors more exacting, and less willing to wait. If you must be angry, simply keep your mouth shut, and it will be thankful for—it half an hour later, and you will seem to have gained a friend that much more of a man.—C. E. Gobe.

Clothing for Men and Boys.

We are busier than ever outfitting men who have decided that there is foundation for The Robinson Co. claim, best Clothing service in Napanee—and who like The Robinson Co.'s assurance "wool" means "all wool" and nothing but wool.

Saturday Night Specials in our Men's Store.

Saturday night, Nov. 24th, any Handkerchief in our Men's Store at twenty per cent. less than regular price.

Saturday night, Dec. 1st.—Sale of Men's and Boys' Collars. Any 25c collar, 20c. Any 20c collar, 15c. Any 15c collar 10c.

Men's Derby Hats, at $2.00.

Our styles in Men's Stiff Hats are correct. "Wakefield" and "Buckley" are the two brands you can depend upon. We have made a specialty of this $2.00 hat business. There are only two other hat dealers in Ontario selling as good a quality hard or soft hat for 2 00 as we do. Most houses charge from 2.50 to 3.00 for the same grade. We have shapes to suit all fancies.

New Umbrellas at Special Prices.

This week we placed in stock two lines of Men's Umbrellas that excel anything we have hitherto shown at the price.

No. 1 is a self-opening Umbrella, made with double braces extra strongly put together and covered with a very heavy good quality of cloth, warranted fast bright black. It is easily worth 1.50, but while they last we sell them at 1.00 each.

No. 2 is also a self-opener with a still better covering and the spring attachment as well as the frame is the strongest we have ever seen. It is easily worth 2.00 and good value at that. Special price 1.50.

MEN WANT THESE.

House Coats and Lounging Robes are being asked for by those who intend to give them away for Christmas presents. Wise move too—chosers get selection while stocks are fullest and varieties greatest. We show very elegant styles and quite a range of prices. Come and inspect them. We import them direct from London, England. No two coats alike.

An Exceptional Chance to Get Fine Irish Table-Cloths and Napkins for Xmas.

They are from William Liddell & Co., of Belfast, Ireland, a manufacturer, who stands in the front rank (so says John Wanamaker). The beautiful Table Cloths and matching Napkins are of the famous "Gold Medal" brand, a brand which means artistic patterns and serviceable quality to every housekeeper.

Take a searching look through your linen closets and see if you don't need a new table cloth for Xmas. It is only a little over four weeks off.

For the advantage of the Xmas shoppers we will quote the sizes and prices of some of our stock.

SPRING NEEDLE COMBINATIONS

For Women.

We are the sole agents in Napanee for this make of knit underwear. There is an increasing demand for them all the time. Those who bought from us last year are sending their friends. The fit of "Spring Needle" garments is every where smooth and glove like, not a sag anywhere. How different from the fit of a two piece suit. The ridge at the waist line and the press and pain under the corset are unknown to Spring Needle wearers.

Every garment guaranteed not to shrink. Winter weights, natural wool, prices reasonable, 36—$2.50, 38—$2.65, 40—$2.75, 42—$3.00.

Spring Needle Corset Covers.

White, long sleeves, knitted with the patent spring needles, fit like the combinations, 34 to 42, 50 cents each.

LONG SILK GLOVES FOR EVENING WEAR.

(Out in a new way).

We have just received a case of Long Silk Gloves for evening wear, cut just like the kid gloves, opening at the hand (Mousquetaire) fastened with 2l dainty pearl dots some fastened at the wrist and others at the elbow. We will date these once. Evening shades of pink, sky, cream and white and black. Prices 75c, $1.00, $1.25. Not long as they last as 50c and $1.00 pair. If you are when buy now for next summer needs. Shirt waists will be short sleeves.

THE FINER QUALITIES OF LACE CURTAINS COME FROM ABROAD.

We deal direct with makers. If you had entry to our custom house you will find records of our business with many unpronounceable names. Names that are foreign to most of us, but recognized as world leaders in curtain making. Our 21st century buyer is in scotland but now here in all its attendrances. We would be very pleased to have you ask to see the very new curtains. FINE NETS, 4.50, 5.00, 6.00. MARIE ANTIONETTE, 5.00 to 10.00. SWISS APPLIQUE, 3.75 to 8.00. SWISS SHEER NET, 7.00 to 10.00.

"Acorn" Table Oilcloth.

(The Oilcloth with a name.)

This special brand is controlled by The Robinson Co. The manufacturer assures us that it will not crack or break unless subject to frost or extreme heat. The designs are the production of artists. We are showing about twenty designs of each width in floral, tile, marble, plain white and black. And the best of it is that you do not have to pay more per yard for it than for the ordinary makes them as they come. We are devoting a corner of store for displaying Acorn Oilcloths. Every yard has the name of brand printed on the back. Look for it.

Carpets and Floor Coverings.

The great bulk of our floor coverings we buy direct from the makers in England and Scotland in the C.S.A. carriage. We save you in buying every farthing that it is possible to get. HOW WORRY KILLS.

Suppose that a man has an uneasy sensation in the locality of his stomach which is due, let us say, to overeating or to gas in the stomach. But he begins to think that it has a serious disease. He reads the advertisements in the newspapers to learn about the symptoms, and he learns about them.

A sense of constriction about the chest." Yes, that is his difficulty exactly! "Slight pain and deep breathing, left arm, with dull digestion, he does not get well nourished.

Bad sleep and bad digestion make him worse and worse. And all the time he keeps thinking about his heart. In the end, he thinking actually affects its condition, until he succeeds in fastening on himself a functional difficulty which may be a really serious and permanent trouble—and the whole of it can be traced back to his crooked thinking about that little pain in his chest.

This is no parable. It is the record of hundreds of actual cases. Every physician comes into contact with them.

A man who keeps worrying about the state of his liver will almost be sure to have trouble with it, eventually. Indigestion can be brought on in the same way, and a host of other ailments.—Dr. Luther Sulick, in the World's Work.

BE LENIENT TO CHILDREN.

Be just as lenient with the mischievousness, mistakes and ignorance of the child as you are with your own, and judge it by considerations from the child's viewpoint rather than that of the adult. Don't expect him instinctively to understand morals without instruction, any more than you would expect him to read without teaching, and don't be afraid that by becoming his confidential friend you unmate him. Just lose any influence, as he soon as he knows that you understand his world, that you appreciate his feelings, that your sympathize with his desires, that you are anxious to afford him all the help possible, he will become all the more amenable to your influence and control. It is not necessary always to explain to a child the reason for every order given. But it is certainly not amiss that the child should understand that every order has a reason back of it, even though you do not tell him what it is.—Home Life."

THIRST, NOT FROST, KILLS PLANTS.

With the coming of frost we are reminded that plants do not freeze to death in the early winter, but perish from thirst. The process is simple. The cold causes the withdrawal of the water from the cells of the plant, forming ice crystals outside of the cells. The frost-action thus contracting the surface, acts as a sort of pump, and as soon as it is emptied of its life giving fluid the plant dies. The truth of this theory has been proved during the present fall by numerous careful experiments. Great variation was found in the amount of cold necessary to cause the death of vegetation, some plants being quickly killed and are killed before the freezing point is reached. Many others will survive zero weather, and some die only at twenty degrees of frost. Certain vegetable growths never freeze. There are forms of bacteria that even when immersed in liquid air, the intensest cold available, come out of their bath as chipper and lively as ever.

USEFUL RECIPE.

From The Lorkins' Home Journal.

William Penn was once urging a man he knew to stop drinking to excess, and the man modestly replied:

"Can you tell me of an easy way to do it?"

"Yes," replied Penn readily, "it is just as easy as to open the door, friend.

"Convince me of that," the man exclaimed, "and I will promise upon my honor to do as you tell me."

"Well, my friend," Penn answered, "whenever thou feels a glass of liquor in thy hand, open that hand before the glass touches thy lips, and thou will never drink to excess again."

The man took the advice of the Friendly one, and Quaker's advice that he followed it and reformed.

SLATE FALLS.

Farmers are taking advantage of the warm weather by getting up their winter's wood.

We had quite a snow storm last week, which made very good sleighing for a few days.

Mr. Herbert Thompson met with a painful accident while working in a lumber shanty at Welwood. He and another man were cutting logs together and in some way a tree struck him breaking his leg just above the ankle. His brothers, Harvey and Will, were working in the same camp, and after getting a doctor at Welwood to set the broken limb, brought him to his home here. He is getting along as well as can be expected after such a long journey. Dr. Tennant is in attendance.

Mr. Theodore Thompson is able to be around again after having his leg broken about six weeks ago.

Miss Edith Bebee attended the funeral of her cousin, Oliver Bebee, at Veneachar on Sunday last.

Mrs. Wm. Thompson is spending a month with her brother at Deseronto.

Mr. Mann Wager is building his camp and stables near White Lake, where he intends lobbing this winter.

Mrs. R. H. Thompson returned to Stirling after spending a month at Walter Thompson's.

Mrs. Hugh Hinchey and her sister, Mrs. Wm. H. Hinchey, spent Thursday in Kingston.

Mr. George Clancy dined at Mr. Wm. Clancy Tuesday, and Mr. and Mrs. Henry Millmans called.

Mr. Wm. Clancy presented his son, Mr. Edwin Wilson, with a fine cow, on his birthday, Nov. 1.

We are glad to say Mr. M. Loucks is able to be around the house, but is yet not without suffering intense pain.

Mrs. Lewis Jackson is, we are pleased to hear, improving. Mr. Albert Switzer took dinner with her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Switzer, Sunday.

Mr. Wm. Clancy's daughter was on Monday was a visitor at the store. One day was time, the horses to attend to, and the cows to milk, without any help. Consequently, the turf went to the street market. Mr. Clancy thanks one and all for turning out so freely.

Mr. Durl Wagar captured a fine mink near the other day. It was a life stealing a gander.

Mrs. Wm. Bailey spent Friday with Mrs. Jacob Clancy.

Some people imagine their footprints traced in the snow the other night? They were not. Some one was after Mr. Winchester.

Miss Myrtle Millman spent a couple of days with her cousins, Misses Gertrude and Laurel Clancy.

KINGSTON OPERA HOUSE

Etienne Girardot will make a return engagement to Kingston appearing in his famous play "Charley's Aunt." Mr. Girardot is alone in the field that he has chosen, and there is no actor today, who is giving the same class of performances, and the public, recognizing this, has accorded to him a position in its favor, that he can justly be classed as foremost of comedy stars of the present day. Every indication points to full houses during the engagement, at the Grand on Saturday, November 24th, matinee and night.

WILTON.

The funeral of the late Mrs. Samson Davey, of Palermo, was held at the home of Mr. Davey's sister, Mrs. H. W. THE WINTER EVENINGS

HOW THEY ARE EMPLOYED INFLUENCES THE CHARACTER.

A TIMELY TALMAGIAN TOPIC

Preacher Pleads For a Wise and Careful Method of Spending the Leisure Period of the Day — What Men Should Do After Their Work For the Day Is Done—How Rest May Be Got From Change of Activities.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1895, by Frederick Dwyer, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 18.—The influence on character of the occupation of the evening hours is the topic of this sermon, which is especially timely at the beginning of winter. The preacher pleads for a wise and careful method of spending the leisure period of the day. The text is Psalm civ. 23, "Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labor until the evening."

I never take a walk or ride upon a street car or enter a store or finish a journey upon a railroad train without being impressed with the universal fact that this is a busy world. Most people are in a treadmill of ceaseless activity. Of course there are individual exceptions to this rule, but the vast majority of the human race are working up to the full limit of their mental and physical capacity, but if we once put ourselves in these men's places invariably we will find out that we could not work harder than they if we tried to do their kind of labor. "What a lazy fellow!" once said a gentleman who was impatiently watching a workman emptying a tank of water into the drain by means of a bucket. "Why, I could fill that bucket twice to his once!" At last he determined to set his workman as an example of the right kind of industry. So he took the pail out of his employe's hands and went to work with intense zeal. The water simply flew out of that tank. Instead of filling the pail two or three times a minute, he emptied six or eight bucketfuls of water a minute. "There," he said to his workman. "Why do you not work like that?" "Please, your honor," answered the workman, "would you be kind enough to go on working that way for another twenty minutes? I never doubted that six pails could be emptied in a minute, but what I want to know is how long you could keep on working at that rate if you had to work all day long!" It is easy enough for a good race horse to run a mile under three minutes, but how many miles could he cover at that rate? Yes, I am right when I assert that the vast majority of people are working up to the full limit of their physical and mental capacity. If they were compelled to do much more, they would soon have a physical collapse, as an overdriven horse might be easily killed if forced to go far at racing speed.

This worldwide work starts at early dawn and continues until on to sunset. Hour after hour the watchman paces his lonely beat during the long, dark hours of the night. No one seems to be anywhere around. The great city seems to be dead. One o'clock passes. Two o'clock comes. All is still. Then 3 o'clock and 4 o'clock. Then the milk wagons begin to rumble. The electric cars begin to roll. By and by the myriads upon myriads of people breakfast. Then the day workmen begin to climb their scaffoldings, and the mechanics sit at their benches, and factory wheels begin to turn, and the stores are crowded with customers, and the law courts are filled with busy lawyers, and the various human beehives hum and buzz with life. But as the day speeds on the tired laborers begin to look at their watches. Three o'clock in the afternoon comes. Then 4, 5, 6. Then the factory whistle blows. The great business centers of the cities are emptied. The shutters are put up. The securities are locked away in the vaults. The showrooms are covered with protecting cloths. Man may work night, ten or even twelve hours, but the evenings for the most part are his own.

Now, I want to consider with you what we shall do with our evenings. I am not here to talk about what we shall do as clerks down at the store, when the eyes of our employers are on us. But what shall we do with our winter evenings, when we are beyond the call of our masters and can do with our time as we will?

The coming, in the first place, should be the home hour. It is the time when a man should get acquainted with his family. It is the time when the home become a child again. Then, instead of being like Paul and putting away "childish things," he should drop the cares of the store and play bean bag with his children and shoot marbles with his boys across the figures of the carpet and tell stories to his little ones, as Eugene Field used to make the children laugh and cry. It is the time when you should try to beat your biggest boy at a game of checkers and when you should read your eldest daughter's last composition and find out how she likes her new teacher. Then, after the babies are put to bed and the good-night prayers have been said and the kisses given, it is the time when you should draw your chair up to the sitting-room fire alongside of your wife's chair. While she is darning the stockings is the time when you should open to her your whole heart and tell her everything about your hopes and your plans.

My brother, have you a right to outgrow your lover's age? Have you a right to steal from the home those sacred hours which you ought to consecrate to the companionship of your wife and children? Shall we do as many men are doing who never have their children think of their father except as money-making machines? Shall we let our wives work and slave for us and yet have their companionship void which only a true husband's love and companionship can fill? I wonder if when we come to die some of us will spend most of our time regretting the evenings which we have spent away from our children and from our wives who have done so much for us? Indeed, my brother, do you not regret even now the evenings you have spent away from home?

Your children when they grow up should be able to look upon you as something different from a mere boarder. When Major D. W. Whipple, the evangelist, some years ago was suddenly called upon to preach to a great audience which had assembled in Pittsburg, he turned to his wife just before he left the hotel and said, "My dear, what shall I preach upon?" Mrs. Whipple's little daughter spoke up and said, "Papa, tell them to come home." By that she meant, "Tell them to come to a heavenly Father, who has never ceased to love his children, who will never leave them comfortless and who will never let them wander beyond his care." That was what the one sentence symbolized. To-night in the eyes of your children stand as the representative of a loving heavenly Father. Have you by your actions taught your children to feel that there is no place in all the wide world where you would sooner be than by their side? Have you taught them that they can come to you in every trouble and that you will be to them a loving, tender, pitiful and gentle, forgiving friend? As a father and as a breadwinner you must work from early morning until the sunset hour. But what have you been doing with your evenings? Have you given them to the club, and to the lodge, and to business, and to outside pleasures and not devoted any of them to holy associations with your family?

The evenings also should be held sacred for meditation and prayer. Just when we find out what is happening in the great wide world and what progress the world has been making in the last fifty or hundred years. It is just as easy to discuss the characters of great men and kings and the principles of Governments as it is to gossip about your neighbors' affairs. It is far more beneficial to the mind and restful to the fagged out mental and physical energies to try to study the origin of Christianity and learn what it is to enter into the quarrels of some husband and wife who are living on the opposite corner of your own home. By personal observation I know that when a man and a woman do not rightly keep their evenings employed for their own mental and spiritual development they are apt to get into mischief.

There never was a truer proverb written than that which says, "The devil has to seek the busy man, but the indolent man hunts the devil." Martin Luther well illustrated this fact when he said: "When I am assailed with heavy tribulations I rush out among my pigs rather than remain alone by myself. The human heart is like a millstone in a mill — when you put wheat under it, it turns and brushes the wheat to flour. If you put no wheat in it, it still grinds on, but then it is itself it grinds and wears away," Luther was right. You must set your minds upon elected task during the winter evenings else you will get into mischief. You will be like the millstones grinding themselves away. If you do not have your evenings occupied with useful duties else you will drift into sinful pleasures. There is no exception to the rule.

"But," you say, "what is the good of your talking to me about getting my evenings up to work? When I come home from the store I am so dead tired that I can hardly move. What my brain needs is not intellectual uplift, but just complete rest. If I can only go to some vaudeville show or concert or have a good laugh or go and have a good dance, all is well." I do not object to these entertainments, but I do say, my friend, you are wrong. The mind and body are not to be physically rested and recreated by doing something foolish and mentally enervating. You are depleting your brain power instead of recruiting it, as some people spoil their children. Thus some of us treat our minds like we treat children. We are forcing and taxing my mind. I will go to a cheap theatre or to a dance hall." No, you are not resting it. You are stuffing it with cakes and candy. Rest of mind simply comes from change of work. What you need to do is to devote winter evenings to good reading, to good thoughts and to high ideals. This means that you must have some work that will recreate and strengthen your energies, depleted by the struggles of the day. Are you willing to pay the price by which our evenings can provide us with a true, beneficial mental development?

But I take a step farther and declare that a large, per cent. of your evenings should be devoted to prayer and to talks to Jesus Christ. These should be the sacred hours when you say, "Lord, what will thou have me to do for my own self or for my own family?" Then, after you have done that, ask those have me to do directly for them?" You know that the Lord commands us to pray for others as well as for ourselves. But that is not enough. We must also give to him our time and our service. Most of us think of this as the work we service during the day. Those hours belong to our employers, but the hours after the day's work are ours, and to the Lord belongs the evening." But we can give to the Lord in the evening. But we can give to the Lord in the evening. And we must give to him these hours if we are to be the world we desire to do.

"But," you say, "I cannot understand you. Is not the incessant care with which you devote to pray leave with our families? Now, how can I visit hospitals and go to sickrooms and look after the poor and afflicted unless I turn my back upon my family? Can a man be in two places at the same time? Can a farmer help a neighbor build his barn and plough his own fields on the same day? How can one look after his own children and associate with those who need help and who are not members of his own family?" I am glad you have asked that. You are just the person with whom I want to talk. You say you are a family man. You say you would be willing to give up certain evenings of your life to serve Christ if thereby you would not have to neglect your home duties. Go forth and invite to your own home the young men and the young women who are living in boarding-houses. Ask them sometimes to supper. Surround them with the influences of your Christian home. You cannot serve God better than by working for him in just this way. I want to tell you the history of a noble Christian woman and what she did in a city of the east.

This lady was a wealthy. She had but little money and a family of growing children. She had to do her own housework. Man may go forth into work and to his labor until the evening, but this woman had to work in the evenings as well. So she said to herself: "I can do little, but that little I will do for my Master. My home shall always be my Saviour's home, and every one I can welcome here in his name I gladly will." She went to work for Christ. She gathered up a large Sunday school class of boys who, for the most part, were homeless. By that I mean those boys who were away from their fathers and mothers and living in boarding houses. There were eighty or thirty of them. These she used to invite to her home. Every week she would have some of them to dinner. Her parlors were their parlors. Her books were their books. When they were sick she took them into her own home and cared for them. Would you like to know the result of that humble Christian lady's Sunday school class harnessed up in Christian work. Although these young men had been boarding-house boys when they first came to Chicago, they were then grown up men, all of them members of Christ's church of Jesus Christ and workers in his vineyard. Cannot you do the same for Christ? Can you not open your Christian home the place of spiritual refuge for those who have no Christian homes and who can be won for Jesus by gathering them around your fireside during the winter evenings?

But I cannot close this talk on evening occupations without placing a special emphasis upon the fact that at least a part of each evening should be consecrated to God for studying his holy word and for prayer. It should be the time when we should go off alone to read the Bible or to open the dear book in the midst of our own family and read to it the sermon which God has written for us and the divine commandments which teach us how to live and how to die. The majority of people never study the Bible intelligently. They rarely read it alone. It is to them a sealed book except as it is interpreted for them by the pulpit. It is just as much a neglected book as during the dark ages, when no layman was allowed to touch it any more than preachers are now allowed by the holy of holies during Mosiac times.

Your ignorance of the Bible is so appalling that I do not believe you know whether the book of Corinthians is in the Old Testament or the New. I do not believe you could tell me in what year your life, why Jesus was born in Bethlehem or why Moses was not allowed to enter the promised land. Now, you would laugh at a woman who was so ignorant as to suppose that Goethe wrote "Hamlet" or that Alfred Tennyson was the author of "Thanatopsis." Yet you are so ignorant of God's word that you could not become a teacher of a Sunday school class of little girls. So, my friends, some part of each evening ought to be held sacred for Bible study and prayer. Carefully guard at least half an hour as sacred for Bible study and for prayer. Then you should turn to God and say: "Master, teach me thy will. Master, let me talk to thee. This is thy quiet hour when thou canst put thy anointing hand upon me to fit me for the duties of the coming day and for holy communion with thee on the approaching Sabbath."

One night during the last sickness of the sailor-preacher, Father Taylor of Boston, the nurses heard some one talking earnestly in the next room. He was very much surprised, because he had left the aged preacher only a few minutes before lying in bed alone. So he went into the sickroom, and there he found the evangelist standing in his nightgown before a chair, praying and pleading with himself to accept Christ. The old man was saying to himself: "You are a sinner, Dwight; you know you are! You are an old man. The grave is directly in your path. Repent of your sins and accept Christ now. There is yet time." Was not that a beautiful way for Father Taylor to spend his last night on earth? Aye, would not that be a beautiful way for us to spend a part of every evening on earth? After the hard work of the day is over, after the cares of the day have left us, let us steal away a little while and open our Bibles. Let us use ourselves to God's loving grace. Let us talk with God. Let us plead with God. Let us then empty ourselves of self and be filled with the spirit of Christ. Then will our evenings be spent aright. Then, with renewed spiritual power, shall we go forth to labor for God in the work of the coming day.

Handling Live Wires.

As an experienced motorman I should like to tell of a simple way to stop the life of the motorman who was killed by the third rail the other day could probably have been saved. If the conductor or guards had taken a newspaper (which is an easy article to get) and used it as a glove or mitten they could have dragged the man from under the car as soon as they reached him, which would have saved some little time in waiting for a rope. I have sometimes in running surface cars torn down overhead wires at this by using a newspaper (or any paper) and folding three or four thicknesses pickedup the live wire and fastened it around a pole or a fence. I am convinced that paper can be used safely in such emergencies and may in future be the means of saving life.—New York Times.

Perpetual Motion.

Some experimenter every now and then tries to persuade himself and the public that he has discovered perpetual motion. Now, perpetual motion means that the machine or a device that would continue forever or until it wore out without the aid of any force external to itself. A machine of this kind is an impossibility. Friction and the resistance of the air are constantly opposing the action of machinery and as matter, on account of what is called inertia, cannot generate power that will make up for the loss every machine must in time come to rest, unless some external force, such as wind, water or steam, keeps acting on it. Perpetual motion is, therefore, impossible.

DO NOT BE A BURDEN.

SOME GOOD ADVICE TO READERS OF THE BEAVER.

A weak stomach and its resulting ills are not natural. With proper care and the use of Mi-o-na stomach tablets, the very worst case of indigestion or stomach trouble can be completely cured.

It is a sin to deprive oneself of enjoyment in life by becoming a burden to others through indigestion.

Sick headaches, headaches, distress after eating, loss of appetite, gulping food and heartburn are symptoms of a weak stomach. Mi-o-na stomach tablets digest food as a few days before mail us strengthen the digestive organs that a part of each evening should be consecrated to God for studying his holy word and for prayer. It should be the time when we should go off alone to read the Bible or to open the dear book in the midst of our own family and read to it the sermon which God has written for us and the divine commandments which teach us how to live and how to die. Pandora Range

SAVES FUEL AND HELPS TO PAY FOR ITSELF.

It is not the price you pay for a range which makes it cheap or expensive, but the fuel it consumes after you get it.

If you buy a range which costs $5 to $7 less than a "Pandora" and it burns a ton, or only half a ton of coal more in a year, what do your gain? Nothing, but you actually lose money, besides putting up with all the inconveniences, troubles and extra work which are a certainty with a poor range.

The "Pandora" is equipped with many fuel-saving features which are not found on any other range. Hot-air flues are constructed so that all the heat from the fire-box travels directly under every pot-hole and around the oven twice—every atom of heat is used, and only the smoke goes up the chimney.

"Yis, sor; but he's wake in his head."

"Young Man—I—er—have called to ask for your daughter's hand in marriage.—Father—You can have it and welcome, young man—that is if you can induce her to take it out of my pocket."

Blones—Why the grouch?

Smith—My wife called me a fool.

Blones—Surely that could not be true.

Smith—But it is. She proved it. Went and dug up a bunch of my old love letters, and I'm a fool for sure.

"I suppose it was a perfectly lovely wedding?"

"Yes. The bride's mother wept all through the ceremony, the table with the presents on upset three times, and the first piece I played on Jack Wallop stepped on Bess Blenkiron's train, nearly tore it off, and I guess it was a trifle more in my life, and I just knew when Gert's cheese factory burned down she'd of honor some such thing would happen."

The Other—Not a single fault.

The One—But he appears to be blind in his right eye.

The Other—Well, that's not his fault; it's his misfortune.

Tommy—Ma! oh, ma!

Ma—Well, what is it, Tommy?

Tommy—When the sun sets does it hatch the stars?

Hook—Jones is the most unfeelingly fellow I know.

Snook—I should think so, indeed. He proposed to a girl once by telegraph, and now she would like to get back.

PROOF THAT BILEANS CURE.

RESULT OF A SCIENTIFIC INQUIRY

ONTARIO LADY'S EVIDENCE.

That leading scientific journal, "Science Siftings," recently made an exhaustive analysis and examination of Bileans for Biliousness, and says:—

"We have satisfied ourselves that Bileans are of purely vegetable origin, that laboratory experiments and practical tests have disclosed to us a valuable preparation . . . excellent tonic and alterative, and a regulator of the liver and bile. Bileans increase secretion in the whole of the digestive tract. When employed in active constipation they do not—as is usually the case with many purgatives cause after constipation. There is no griping. They relieve flatulence, sick headache, and biliousness. Bileans are in excellent family medicine."

Mrs. E. Reed, of Kingston, (Ont.), says:—"I suffered terribly with indigestion and ailments arising from it. All last winter and well into the spring I was under the doctor until I found a cure in Bileans. Soon after using I felt an unconquerable fulness in the stomach, a steady pain in the region of the heart, accompanied by a retching and belching of gas. I was hardly ever free from this retching and belching night or day, and the result was that my sleep was much broken into. I tried first one thing and then another, but nothing seemed to do me any good and I grew very nervous and discouraged. My strength sbbed away so that I could not work, and I have kept to the floor for hours at a time in pain. This was my state when I first tried Bileans. The very first dose gave me relief from the trial. I persevered with them until all symptoms of my trouble had disappeared and been entirely removed. My illness had caused me to be completely run down, but since taking Bileans I seem like a different person. I have gained in flesh considerably and feel much stronger."

Bileans are a certain cure for headache, constipation, piles, liver trouble, indigestion and all disorders of the stomach, female ailments, skin eruptions, bilious fever, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, foul breath, dizziness, fainting, sinking or weak feelings, nervousness, uncomfortable fulness even after a light meal, weak pains, anaemia, debility, etc. They also act as a general tonic and by improving the tone of the whole system enable it to throw off colds, chills, rheumatism, etc., and improve the general circulation, and are a boon to over-worked men and women. For all purposes to which a household remedy is put, Bileans will be found of excellent service. Obtainable from all druggists and stores at 50 cents per box, or direct from the Bileans Co., Colborne street, Toronto, upon receipt of price, 6 boxes for $2.50.

COME FOR AN AERO RIDE?

Paris, Nov. 15.—M. Santos Dumont, since the successful flight of his aeroplane. The Bird of Prey, takes enthusiastically of the early approach of the day when air manning will be navigating the air and when flying machines will be as common as motor cars. Indeed, he thinks that the flying machine will soon be used for the poor man's automobile—safer, faster and cheaper. In an interview he said:

"The machine I am experimenting with is very large, having a surface of eighty square metres, but the practical aeroplane which will be for the air what the Democratic bicycle is for the earth, will be much smaller. With ordinary flying machines it is necessary to increase the size in order to increase the power. With the aeroplane, on the contrary, the power would be increased in direct proportion to the diminution of the resisting surface.

"My present aeroplane was intention only built large to overcome small obstacles as to principles. But with increased power which means speed, the size can be reduced. At the same time so can the cost. And just there is peace. There will be no collisions. Next year people will be able to go, to the seashore on their aeroplanes. It will become as fast and as safe as the automobile of a new industry.

"The only danger would be the risk of a broken rudder, and I cannot see that. Accidents would break itself."

"When the automobile was first introduced," he went on, "the streets crowded by people who had the temerity to operate this new machine, and cat-calling at them as the fashionable through fires of every description. There will be a short apprenticeship, but that can be done on Sunday in a field. In brief, the day is not far distant when the aeroplane, as a means of locomotion, will be known in the air the bicycle is in the earth."

SCOTTISH CONCERT.

According to the disagreeable night the "Royal Scots" Concert Co. did not draw a very large audience two weeks ago in Desmond's Opera House, but the elements were not daunted with Miss Donaldson and her company, that Mr. Naylor has given them an encore, and arranged for their re-appearance at Desmond's Opera House next Tuesday evening, 27th Nov. The Tribune says of the former concert: "Miss Flora Donaldson sang the songs of her mother, and in a voice that left nothing to be desired. Mr. Neil, from his opening number, "Allen Water," showed himself one of the first singers. Each soloist was encored most heartily, and each note was perfect. In the duets, in which sisters were heard, the voices of the two blended perfectly in a concord of music. Other numbers were given by Miss Neil and Mr. Hall, but the could not be said of Fred. Howard, who is a monologist and gave a number of stories that did give a comic concert and a musical evening. Taken altogether, the concert was a first-class one.

THE ANNUAL MEETING

of Mrs. Symington's Bible class met at her home last Friday evening, 16th Nov. After greeting and hand shaking, all were invited to partake of a beautiful meal with Mr. Symington at the head of the table. Mr. A. E. Faul was elected chairman, a position he filled with honor and credit, and in his address, spoke of the benefits and blessings he had derived while attending this class. All of the class present were asked to speak on the studies and what impression it left on them. Mr. Faul called on Christ, to which all responded by showing how closely they followed the lessons under Mrs. Symington's teaching. Rev. J. R. Reid, Mrs. Madole and Miss Madole were short addresses. Mrs. Symington gave a splendid paper on her thirty years as teacher of this class; what changes had taken place since she started, ministers, teachers, superintendents, and the personnel of her class, many of whom have gone out as Rib'e class teachers and other religious work. After singing by Mrs. Black and others, Rev. Mr. Reid closed with prayer, and all went away saying what a blessed meeting.

PRESENTATION.

About fifty friends and neighbors gathered at the home of Mrs. Allen Clancy, Wesley, on Monday evening, as a farewell to her, who with her family, will shortly leave for their new home in Napanee. A pleasant evening was passed with laughter, song and games. Refreshments were served by the ladies, after which the following address and presentation took place:

Wesley, Nov. 19th, '06.

Dear Mrs. Clancy,—Having heard of your intended departure from our midst, we, the members of the Auxiliary and Church, have met here tonight to show in some tangible manner our appreciation of you as a neighbor, who, in sickness or when help was needed, was always ready to lend a helping hand. We are very sorry to lose you from among us, and realize your place will be hard to fill. We trust that where you go the people may find in you that same kindly Christian character, for there is always work to do in the Master's vineyard, by sympathy, love and help to those who need it.

Although we may meet with discouragements along the path of life, let us be steadfast, and remember that God does not look on our work with man's eyes, and that no mistakes shall be made by the Great Overseer.

While we wish you, every prosperity both spiritual and temporal, in your new home, we ask you to accept this clock and bedroom set as a reminder of the friends you have left at Wesley.

Mrs. Clancy, though taken completely by surprise, expressed her thanks in a choking voice and her sorrow at leaving her old friends. "God be with you till we meet again," was then sung, and all dispersed to their several homes.

SHIELD YOUR NERVES.

A beautiful woman gave the following advice to a girl friend: "Whatever you do, don't worry, and don't let them become too sensitive. Shield yourself like Mrs. Langtry. If you feel you must expose the platform wildly, and inquire what the next encore is, and then calmly to wait for it. That's just what Langtry says you don't do; they all say, perhaps, but they to the floor with their feet, clinch and bite their handkerchief and are apparently in a terrible heat at encores. Only the actress of every trade that comes in contact with the public have to learn that these encores are nerve destroyers, and they are practically useless. Don't you mind the encores, but if you cannot do that, don't you dare to show it. Shield your nerves, and you will be a success."

MADILL BROS.

The Bridal Eve

"Ah, do not pray for it, Cassinove. All that enables me to endure this hour is the firm conviction that I shall not survive you."

The officers, who had considerately held back while this little by-scene was going on between the husband and wife, now advanced to remove the prisoner.

At Laura's urgent entreaty, Cassinove requested that she might be permitted to accompany him to the prison, and the request was immediately granted.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Among the spectators in the court-room, who had awaited in the greatest anxiety the result of the trial, was the poor little dark-eyed woman, whom we have known as the Widow Russel, but who was, as has since been shown, the wife of the miscreant, Thugsen.

She had remained closely veiled, and carefully concealed in an obscure corner of the courtroom, whence, unnoticed, she had watched the progress of the trial. When the verdict of the jury was rendered it was but half-smothered shriek that broke the breathless silence of the room.

After the sentence of death was pronounced, and before the crowd began to disperse, she crept out, in a sort of horror of amazement, and bent her tottering steps toward Glitspur street, murmuring, as she went along:

"Guilty! Death! Oh, Heaven! to suspect what I suspect; nay, to know what I know, and to let him die! To let him die—so young, so good, so guiltless! To let him die when a word from me would save him! It would be murder! I should have his death and hers, too, for she would not survive him, on my soul! I, too, should be a murderer—should become a murderer by merely living with a murderer! Should catch blood-guiltiness as one catches the plague, from contagion! It must not be! I cannot rest as the confidante of crime! The innocent life shall not be sacrificed through me!

"But, then, the unnatural horror of having to give information against—oh, my God!—against the husband of my youth—the father of my children! But there is a law of righteousness above all the laws of nature, and that I must obey!

"This evening I will tell him all I know, and give him the opportunity of acting right! Then, if he does not, I must deliver him up to justice! I must do it. It will kill me, but I must do it!"

Those who saw her reeling along the street, and muttering to herself, thought her drunk or mad.

At length, half conscious of the suspicious glances turned toward her, the distracted woman stopped an empty hackney coach that was passing by, and entered it, telling the driver to take her to Berwick street. It was at some distance from the Old Bailey, in the densest, poorest and most crowded portion of London.

She pulled the check-string, and stopped the carriage at the entrance of the street.

She alighted, paid the fare, dismissed the carriage and proceeded on foot up the narrow and ever-crowded street, until she paused before a tall, three-storied, red brick house, in rather better preservation than those in its immediate neighborhood. She entered the house with a pass-key, carefully locked the door, and turned to another door on the right of the front passage, that admitted her into a suite of three rooms; the front room being the bedchamber, the middle room the parlor and the back room the kitchen.

She laid off her bonnet and shawl in the front chamber, went into the parlor, and set the table for dinner, and then proceeded to the kitchen to prepare the meal, for there seemed to be neither servant nor child on those premises. This small, solitary woman appeared to be the only denizen of this great, lonely house. Yet this was really not so, for when an hour had passed there was the sound of a key turning in the lock of the street door, followed by the entrance of a man, who fastened the door after himself, and advanced along the passage into the parlor, where the little woman stood cutting bread at the table.

"Well, Ruth, is dinner ready?" inquired the man, throwing his hat upon a side table and sinking into an armchair.

"No, Robert; the soup will need to simmer half an hour longer."

"So we've been out."

"Yes, Robert; I've been at the Old Bailey."

"And what the demon had you to do at the Old Bailey?" asked the man, losing somewhat of his habitual good temper and courtesy.

"I have been seeing a guiltless man tried for willful murder; I have been hearing a innocent man condemned to die the death of a murderer!" said Ruth, solemnly.

"You crazy! The jury were quick about their work! Is he sentenced?"

"He is sentenced to die for a crime of which he is perfectly innocent."

"Innocent! innocent! what the foul fiend do you mean by harping upon that word? How the demon do you know that he is innocent?" inquired Thugsen, angrily.

"By knowing who is guilty," replied Ruth.

"How! What the d——! Oh, the woman has lost her wits!" exclaimed Thugsen, with a light laugh.

"No, Robert Thugsen, I have not lost my wits! Would to Heaven that I had! I know what I am saying! I know that Cassinove is innocent of the crime for which he is condemned to die, by knowing too well who is guilty," said Ruth, solemnly.

"Who the demon, then, is guilty? Speak, woman—speak at once!" exclaimed Thugsen, desperately, starting up and confronting her.

She arose from her seat, and stood before him as pale as death, firm as fate; and, placing her hand upon his chest, and looking him full in the face, she said:

"Robert Thugsen, thou art the man!"

He started back, appalled, as though the angel of destruction had arisen before him.

He gazed upon the accusing spirit, faltering forth the words:

"How? What! how the demon could you know that?" Then, suddenly recovering his self-possession, and with it his consummate hypocrisy, he burst into a loud laugh. He threw himself into a chair, exclaiming:

"Oh, you are mad! mad as a March hare! You shall have a strait-jacket and a shower bath."

"Do not mock my words, or your own position," she said, sinking again into her seat. But as he continued laughing and rubbing his hands as in the highest enjoyment of an excellent jest, she resumed, gravely:

"Yes, I feel that you have a right to laugh me to scorn, a reason to despise me thoroughly, for you know that wherever you have been concerned I have been culpably weak, so weak, indeed, as to suffer myself to be drawn into a labyrinth of deepest guilt, not, indeed, as an active agent, for that never could have been, but as an accessory."

"What can the fool mean?" interjected Thugsen.

"I mean this. After the unnatural and nameless crime that shocked the whole civilized world from its propriety; that made you the outlaw of nature as well as of society; from the charge of which you fled the world for years, giving yourself out as dead; after all this I had the folly to receive you back again; yes, though at first I fled from you as you had fled from your kind; though I hid my children from you, as I would have hid them from a lion or leper; though fear, and horror, and loathing struggled desperately with the old affection, yet when you sought me I received you back again, and in doing so plunged my soul in the deepest guilt, by leaving it with all your subsequent crimes."

"Crimes, woman!" exclaimed Thugsen, sternly.

"Crimes! Yes! You need not glare at me with that ferocious glance. I am not frightened; I am too far gone in wickedness for that. The sting of conscience that goad me to speak as I do, and to act as I must, hurt me more than all you could say or do," said Ruth, with the firmness of despair.

"What crimes are there that you dare to charge me with?" demanded Thugsen, in the low, deep, stern tones of concentrated and suppressed passion.

"The assassination of Sir Vincent Lester, the cruel deception of the young Duchess of Bereseligh, the deadly peril of the guiltless Ferdinand Cassinove, about to die for your deed, and the awful sorrow of his innocent young wife. Heavily, heavily press this guilt upon my soul; and, Robert Thugsen, I must cast it off. Justice must be done! The innocent shall be cleared!" said Ruth, solemnly.

"You are crazy now, his aspect gradually changed. With much effort he really assumed his ease, and assumed a calmness that he was far from feeling. When she had ceased to speak, he said:

"You have charged me with three crimes. What reason or authority have you for doing so?"

"Your own words."

"My own words?"

"Your own words."

"What the fiend do you mean by that?"

"Robert Thugsen, the conscience that sleeps throughout the day, awakes at night. When all your other senses are wrapped in forgetfulness, that sense of guilt remembers and raves."

"In other words, after a heavy supper, I have bad dreams, and mutter incoherent words in my sleep."

"Yes, you talk in your sleep."

"And upon the ramblings of an uneasy dream you would found a charge of guilt. Have you never dreamed of doing things that you really never could do—thing, for instance? he interjected, disdainfully.

"Robert, your midnight ravings are not like the innocent fantasies of other dreamers. Nor is it only a vague 'shadow of guilt and scent of blood' that afterwards pass slightly before us, each night you rehearse, again and again, all the horrors of that midnight murder!" cried Ruth, shudderingly.

Thugsen could control the tones of his voice—but not the currents of his blood; but the dreadful twilight of that sombre room concealed the unearthly pallor of his face, or the demoniac glare of his eyes, as he inquired, in a tone of assumed calmness:

"So I dream every night that it was I who murdered Sir Vincent Lester? And my dreams seem to be quite dramatic, worthy even of your accurate remembrance. Now I always forget my dreams, so that I should like to hear you relate this very remarkable one."

"It is too horrible!"

"What, the dream?"

"To hear you trifle so with such tremendous guilt!"

"I wish it but a dream, you know!"

"Ah!" she exclaimed, shuddering. "You don't believe me!"

"No!"

"Tut! Come, draw up the curtain! let us see what this very dramatic dream is," he said, disdainfully.

"Oh! do not thus play with your crimes and their consequences. You pretend not to credit me, and you credit my words lightly! but you shall soon know better. You shall hear from my lips the dream in which each night you re-enact the tragedy at Hare House, revealing not only your acts, but your passions and emotions—your hatreds, fears, hopes, and purposes—speaking out what then you only thought and felt!"

"Come, this is the prologue! let us have the play," said Thugsen, ironically.

"Listen, then, Robert Thugsen," continued Ruth, in the tone and manner of one speaking under a powerful inward impulse. "Each night, in your dream, again you lurk around Lester House, hiding in the deepest shadows, and from your hair, like some wild beast crouching to spring upon its prey, you watch the watch until it has passed; then swiftly and silently you dart down the basement stairs; you examine all the doors and windows, and find one window carelessly left open; you raise it and creep into the kitchen, closing it after you; you pause, watching and listening for the slightest sound or movement in that dark, still house; but hearing nothing, and believing all the household sorrow in the front one, you draw from your pocket a bunch of well-filed skeleton keys, and creep up the narrow stairs and along the passages; a single bolt or bar shot into its place would have arrested your progress, and saved you from crime and him, from death, and you wonder as you steal along on your fatal errand that nothing for the slightest obstructs your way; you do not know that the butler, whose last duty it is to secure the doors, has not yet retired to bed, but it shut up in his office, casting up his accounts; and that carelessness! And so silently and breathlessly you glide like a serpent from landing to landing, until you reach the door of your victim's room. You pause again, and, standing breathless, there you watch and listen; all is dark, and still without and within. You insert the key, silently turn the lock, and enter.

"How still the room—the only sound the ticking of the ormolu clock upon the mantelpiece. By the dim light of the taper burning on the hearth, you see the closely-drawn curtains of your victim's bed. You creep toward it, and and felt, as well as what you saw and did!" concluded Ruth, shuddering.

Could she have seen his face as she finished her narrative she had not trusted her own life in his hands for another hour; but the gathering shadows of night concealed it from her; but his tones were light and bantering, as he said:

"A singular psychological phenomenon! What else? That cannot be all upon which you found your opinion of my guilt?"

"It is enough; yet it is not all."

"What more?"

"The dagger!"

"The dagger!"

"Yes, Robert Thugsen, the dagger that was found in Mr. Cassinove's hand, but with which you had done the murder!"

"What the fiend are you driving at now? What about the dagger? Come, what about it?"

"It was produced to-day in court; I recognized it; it was yours!"

"Go on," said Thugsen. "You are trying to get up quite a case against me. Anything more?"

"Alas, yes!"

"Out with it, then! Let us have the whole at once. Never make two bites at a cherry. Yes, I think, have made ten at this, and have not finished it yet. Come, what more?"

"The sheath!"

"Oh, ha, ha, ha! this woman will certainly be the death of me! Yes, I had a sheath for the dagger; now it is the sheath! Ha, ha, ha! Well, what about the sheath?"

"The night upon which you came to me at the cottage at Chelsea, you threw off your coat upon the bedroom floor. I took it up to hang it——"

"As you would like to hang its owner," interposed Thugsen.

"As I raised it up, something fell from the pocket; I stooped to see what it was, and picked up the empty sheath of your antique Toledo poniard; it was crusted thickly with dried blood——"

"Was the demon she did you not speak of it at the time, then?" interrupted Thugsen.

"Horror transfixed me. When I recovered the use of my faculties, fear for you sealed my lips."

"Fear for me?"

"Yes, fear for you! Laura Elmer, as I told you, was my guest that night. Her suspicions were already aroused against you; she might have overheard my words that passed between us. I did away the tell-tale sheath, and should never have spoken of it again, had not young Cassinove been convicted. Oh, Robert! the guiltless must not die for the guilty."

"Hush!" exclaimed Thugsen, with difficulty controlling his emotion. "From the accident of an empty dagger's sheath and a disturbed dream, you think that you have made out a very strong case against me; it is nonsense; but let that pass for the present. You have also charged me with the deception of the young Duchess of Bereseligh; now, what have I to do with the Duchess of Bereseligh, or the Duchess of Bereseligh with me?"

"You should have nothing to do with her, more than a spirit of darkness has to do with an angel of light; and yet you have twice cruelly deceived her."

"Explain yourself, Ruth; by my soul, I do not understand you."

"Thugsen, you have buried me here, in the obscurest part of London. I am so completely isolated in this crowded quarter of the town as though I were in the midst of the deserts of Asia, or the forests of America. I speak to no person—I see no paper—and you think that I am, therefore, ignorant of what goes on in the great world; and so I am, to a great extent. But this morning a piece of an old newspaper fell into my hands. It came around a parcel that I had brought from the drapery establishment, and contained the following paragraph, and there I read a short account of the charge brought against the young Duchess of Bereseligh."

She paused, and held her hand to her side, as though in pain.

"Go on," said Thugsen.

"I discovered by that account that you had cruelly deceived her twice. First, when she was a young girl, and you were hiding in her foster-mother's house, you passed yourself off for a magician, and attempted to consummate a marriage with her, a crime, the completion of which was prevented by the timely arrival of the constable in search of you. And now, when years have passed, and she is the lawful wife of one of England's proudest peers, you, knowing that you have not the smallest shadow of a claim upon her, dare to demand her as your wife, and threaten her with a criminal prosecution should you be repulsed. Of course you are aware that that highborn lady can know nothing of the poor, obscure wretch who was the position into which you would force her, nor could you suppose that any knowledge of your crimes had reached the Duchess of Bereseligh to me."

Thugsen started, and walked once or twice in the room. Then, suddenly pausing before her, and speaking with as much calmness as he could assume, he said:

"To whom have you gossiped of these matters?"

"To no one on earth."

"So help you Heaven!"

"So help me Heaven! in my dying hour."

"It is well; I believe you," said Thugsen, taking his seat near her, and continuing: "You seem to have taken the demon into your council, else I do not see how you ever contrived to amass such an amount of evidence against an innocent man, and that man your own husband. And now, what do you mean to do with it?"

"Nothing, Robert, until you have fled the country."

"But if I do not choose to fly from a false charge?"

"It will not be a false charge."

"But if I do not choose to fly?"

"Then your blood be upon your own head; for whether you fly or not, Robert Thugsen, I must do my duty. It will break my heart, but I must do it."

"What duty? How will you do it?" inquired the man, in a low, stifled voice.

"Listen. This is Thursday. Cassinove is ordered for execution on Monday. On Monday, also, the trial of the Duchess of Bereseligh comes on. I will give you until to-morrow evening to make your escape. You will have plenty of time to reach Dover, and take the boat for Calais. To-morrow evening I will place all the facts with which I am acquainted in the hands of the police."

"Ha! ha! ha! Why, even if the evidence were worth anything, it could not be taken from you. You are my wife."

"I know, and my evidence against you could not be received in court, but I could give what information I possess to the police, and let them follow it up as they chose. I must do this, it will kill or craze me, but I must."

"And this is your final resolution?"

"It is; oh, Robert, fly and save yourself! I have still a little money left; you can take it all."

"Come, I have had no dinner to-day. light the lamps and see to the soup."

With a deep sigh at his apparent insensibility, Ruth lighted a lamp and sat it upon the table, and then went out to attend to the dinner.

Thugsen made a turn or two around the room, muttering to himself:

"She knows too much; she knows too much; her own lips have spoken her own doom; it can be delayed no longer. Fool that I was that she is so very wretched, that it would be a mercy to put her out of her misery,

16½ paces east of Royal Hotel.

He took his seat and commenced eating his soup. Presently he looked up at Ruth.

Ruth was looking down upon hers, and delicately skimming it, and dropping the scum into a waste plate.

"What is that?" he inquired, uneasily.

"Only a little soot fallen upon my soup," she replied, beginning to eat.

He was reassured. Soot was black; the powder he had poured into the soup was white, and, besides, he had seen it dissolve. He watched her eating. Poor creature! notwithstanding her troubles, she ate rather eagerly, for she was faint and hungry from long fasting.

"She enjoys her last meal without a thought that she partakes of it in her last hour. Well, after all, how much easier her death will be than if she should live to die what is called a natural death—a long, painful illness, slowly wearing out her life. It will soon be over; I hope, even in that little time, she will not suffer much," thought Thugsen, as he watched her.

"You do not eat your soup; there is no soot fallen into yours?" inquired Ruth.

"No, there is none in mine," replied Thugsen, with a hidden significance, as he fell to and rapidly finished his soup.

Ruth removed the empty basins, and began to [illegible] the roasted fowl that formed the next course. Thugsen watched her some sign of approaching illness.

There was none as yet. Ruth finished carving, and set his favorite pieces before him.

"Are you not going to take any?" inquired Thugsen.

"The smell alone was quite enough for me; I felt faint and hungry when I sat down, but my appetite has gone off with the soup."

"You are not well," said Thugsen.

"I am as well as I can be, with the anxiety and grief that oppresses my mind, Robert."

"Ah! you are still resolved to inform the police of what you suspect to-morrow?"

"Alas! yes, Robert! but not until you escape."

"I think you will not," said Thugsen, laughing carelessly; but in the midst of that laugh, his face turned pale, and a shiver passed over his frame.

"What is the matter?" said Ruth.

"A sudden qualm; you upset me with your diabolical nonsense; it is over now—bring in the pudding."

Ruth cleared the table, and went out into the kitchen to fetch the pudding. When she returned she found Thugsen white and convulsed in his chair. She set down the dish, and ran to him, exclaiming:

"Robert! Robert! what is the matter?"

"Ill, ill, ill to death!" gasped the sufferer, while a cold sweat bathed his pallid forehead.

Ruth poured out a glass of brandy, and held it to his lips.

"No! water! water! my throat is burning up!" whispered Thugsen, hoarsely.

Ruth hastily poured out a glass of water, and held it to him.

He drank it eagerly, swallowing with difficulty. It seemed to relieve him for an instant, for he sat up, wiped his brow, stared at Ruth with that confusion of mind that extreme pain and exhaustion produces, and exclaimed:

"Woman! what is the meaning of this? You are not ill!"

"No, Robert, only anxious."

"But I am! How is that?"

"I do not know, Robert. You talk, and act, and look so strangely. Come into your room and lie down, and perhaps you will be better," said Ruth, gently, taking his arm to assist him.

But a third, and more violent fit of pain and shivering seized the man; his features were blackened and distorted; his limbs drawn up and convulsed.

Ruth was dreadfully frightened; she supported his head, and took away the lock that went from his brow. As soon as the fit passed, and he regained the power of utterance, he glared at Ruth, and shrieked:

"You have poisoned me! you have poisoned me! Murderess, you shall swing for it!"

"I—I—Robert? I poison you? But you don't know what you are saying—you are so ill. Come, let me help you to bed, and I will run for the apothecary over the way," exclaimed the terrified wife.

"Traitress! murderess! you have poisoned me, and you know it!"

"Oh, Robert!"

"Answer me, woman! what did you do to the soup while I was in the bedroom?"

"Nothing, on my soul and honor."

"Nothing? Think—answer on your life, as you would answer on the last day—what did you do to the soup?"

"Nothing, as I hope for salvation! I changed the basins, but I never did anything to the soup."

"You changed the basins!" cried Thugsen, in horror.

"Yes; when I came in I noticed, for the first time, that a little soot had fallen into yours, and knowing you to be very dainty with your eating, I changed the basins—giving you mine, and taking yours. You ate me afterward, at dinner, taking the soot off."

While she spoke, he sat listening, with a face blanched by bodily pain, horror, and despair.

Ruth gazed at him in consternation, exclaiming:

"There was no ill in what I did, Robert, was there? I did it for your sake. Oh, Robert, what is the meaning of all this?"

"You have poisoned me! that is it—poisoned me!"

His words, arrested by a spasm, were followed by convulsions so violent that Ruth left him the chair, and writhed up on the floor.

Ruth dared delay no longer. She rushed from the house, and ran across the way, into the apothecary's shop, exclaiming:

"Oh, Mr. Jones, for Heaven's sake, come immediately! I do fear my husband is dying in a fit!"

"Your husband? Who is he? Has he been drinking?" inquired the druggist.

"No, no; he fears it is poison! but it cannot be that, and I do not know what it is! Oh, do, pray sir, be quick! It is just over the way," cried Ruth, distractedly.

Mr. Jones took his hat, and immediately attended Ruth.

They found Thugsen extended on the floor, writhing in the agonies of death, and speechless through exhaustion.

Mr. Jones knelt down by his side, and began to examine his condition. While Ruth, in an agitated manner, recounted the first symptoms of his attack.

"It seems a case of poisoning by strychnine, madam," said the chemist, rising.

"Yes, yes, it was by strychnine I prepared it," gasped Thugsen.

"Prepared it!" repeated Jones, looking around the chamber, leaving the room and hurrying over to his shop, whence he dispatched his shop boy to fetch a policeman. Then, telling his assistant to attend him, he returned to the house, bringing with him the most powerful known antidotes to strychnine.

With the help of his young man, he undressed Thugsen and put him to bed, when the patient returned with accelerated violence. As soon as these had left, and he was able to swallow, the druggist administered the antidotes, which procured the patient a short respite from acute suffering.

Meanwhile, the shop boy arrived with the policeman.

"Take that woman in charge, and see that she does not make her escape. I suspect her of having poisoned her husband!" said Mr. Jones to the officer.

"Me! me!" cried Ruth, in dismay. "He chases you, with much apparent reason, madam! You alone prepared the dinner; he was taken ill after eating it, and before leaving the table. His illness is the effect of strychnine. You will, therefore, see the propriety of her being kept in restraint until the affair can be investigated," said Jones.

"But I am innocent; indeed, I am, sir. If he has taken strychnine, I cannot imagine how it could have got into the soup, unless—oh! my Lord!" exclaimed Ruth, sinking into her chair, and covering her face with her hands, as a suspicion of the truth, for the first time, glanced into her mind.

"Officer, do your duty," said the chemist, coldly.

The policeman advanced toward Ruth.

She held up her hands deprecatingly, saying:

"Oh, do not remove me from this room! I am innocent. He is my husband; let me stay to watch him. I will not run away; indeed I will not."

"If you please, sir, I can take the woman into custody, and keep her in his room all the same," urged the policeman.

"Very well; see that she does not elude you and make her escape," said Jones.

And the policeman told Ruth that she was his prisoner, and must not leave the room, and then he took up his position at the door.

"He seems easier. Don't you think he may get over it, sir?" said Ruth, wringing her hands.

"Impossible to tell, ma'am. It will be a severe struggle between the powers of life and death. The very antidotes I am obliged to administer are terribly exhausting," said the cautious chemist.

As if to prove his words true, Thugsen was again seized with frightful convulsions. His face was black, and his frame horribly distorted.

"Oh, Heaven, how dreadful! Had you not better send for more advice?" pleaded Ruth, weeping, and wringing her hands.

"I shall, if this continues, to save myself from the burden of a sole responsibility; but it is just as well to tell you that no one can do more for him than I am doing now," said Mr. Jones, preparing another dose. It was administered, and the patient again sunk into the quietude of exhaustion.

The night was now far advanced. By the orders of Mr. Jones, who took upon himself the direction of affairs, the house was closed up. The chemist's assistant and the shop boy sat nodding in the adjoining parlor, to be ready in case they were wanted. The policeman leaned against the frame of the communicating door, and dozed upon his watch. Mr. Jones and poor Ruth sat, the one on the right and the other on the left of the bed.

The quiet of the house was presently interrupted by the wild tossing and groaning of the patient, who presently fell into the most frightful convulsions, turning black in the face, foaming at the mouth, throwing his body into the most horrible contortions, sometimes in his fierce agony throwing himself from the bed, and ever, as the momentary relaxation of the nervous tension permitted him to speak, breaking into the fiercest accusations against Ruth, or the most abject entreaties for mercy or for life.

"Oh, Jones, for the love of Heaven, do what you can to save me. I am not fit to die. Ah, murderess, you shall pay for this! Oh, Heaven, what tortures! Ah, wretch, this is your doings, and you shall not escape!"

Thus he revealed the agony of his body, and the anguish and terror of his soul, until the returning stricture of his throat for a time strangled out both speech and breath.

The poor wife and the apothecary both did all they could to relieve and soothe the suffering man. But these last convulsions were so much more violent and long-continued than any which had preceded them, and were followed by a fit of such deep prostration, that Mr. Jones could no longer hesitate to call in additional advice. He went into the adjoining parlor, and woke up his assistant, saying:

"You must go immediately and bring a physician—Dr. Clark, if possible. And you must also bring a magistrate. I fear very much that we shall have to get the dying deposition of this unfortunate man."

Young Benson quickly aroused himself and departed on his errand.

Day was dawning as he left the house.

Poor Ruth, forgetting that she was a prisoner, got up to open the windows and kindle the kitchen fire to prepare the breakfast, but the policeman stopped her at the door. And when she explained the nature of her errand, the chemist told her that he would send his shop boy to the next pastry cook's and have breakfast brought for the watchers.

And Ruth returned to her seat on the right of the bed, where she quietly remained for perhaps an hour, at the end of which time the whole party were startled by a loud knocking at the street door.

Mr. Jones answered the knock, and admitted a gentleman, to whom he had come in answer to a message left for him an hour ago.

Mr. Clark, or Mr. Humphreys, the magistrate, into the parlor, and having seen him seated, related the facts of this poisoning case as they had come to him knowledge.

"The suffering man is now reposing, and I think he had better not be disturbed just now. The suspected woman is also in his room, but in charge of a policeman.

"Send the woman in here. I would like to question her," said the magistrate.

Ruth came in at the summons, and gave exactly the same account of her husband's attack of illness that she had given to the apothecary.

"How long has she been in your custody?" inquired the magistrate of the policeman.

"Since last night, sir."

"Then, if there is a secure room in this house, she had better be confined in it."

Mr. Jones undertook the survey of the upper stories of the house, and reported a comfortable and secure bedroom on the second floor front.

And to this room poor Ruth was conducted and there imprisoned.

Meanwhile the physician, Dr. Scott, arrived, and was shown into the chamber of death.

The patient was lying extended, in a state of deep prostration, with the cold clay sweat beaded upon his brow.

Dr. Scott looked into his face, felt his pulse, sighed, and, in answer to the eager, low-toned questions of the bystanders, said:

"He seems to be sinking fast."

Then the doctor wrote a prescription, and dispatched the young chemist's assistant over to the shop to make it up. When this was brought and administered, the sufferer seemed to be temporarily revived.

"How are you, sir?" said the magistrate, approaching the bedside.

"I do not know. Oh, doctor! doctor! am I dying?" exclaimed Thugsen, turning his eyes, wild with excitement, upon the physician.

"Oh, no! certainly not; far from it," replied Dr. Scott, telling the professional lie.

"Do you feel equal to giving an account of this attack of illness?" inquired the magistrate.

"Doctor, am I in any danger of death?" said Thugsen, turning again to the physician.

"By no means, my good friend," said the doctor.

"Can you give us any account of your illness?" persisted the magistrate.

"Yes; my wife and I had a quarrel. She prepared the soup; I ate of it, and immediately sickened. She, poor, erring creature, where is she now?"

"Confined in a room upstairs."

"Keep her there, lest she do more mischief," said Thugsen, who, hoping for his own life, felt anxious that Ruth should be kept in confinement, lest she should put in execution her resolve to inform against himself.

"Are you willing to make oath to all you have said?" inquired the magistrate.

"Yes, for it is the truth," answered Thugsen, who soon after fell into horrible convulsions that lasted fifteen minutes, and which were being extended without sense or motion.

"I warn you, Dr. Scott, that if you think this man in extremis, you should inform him of his condition, that he may know it when called upon to make his deposition," said the magistrate.

"Sir, when the patient is in extremis, I will tell him so; until then, and while there is the slightest possibility of saving life, it is my duty to encourage him to the utmost," replied the physician, who was very proud of his medical skill for the help of the sufferer.

Breakfast for the watchers now arrived from the pastry cook's, and interrupted further conversation. A cup of coffee, a roll and an egg were sent up to Ruth. The policeman took them in.

"How is Captain Thugsen now?" inquired Ruth, as he entered the room.

"I am forbidden to hold any conversation with you, mum," replied the policeman, setting down the tray and leaving the room.

And Ruth was abandoned to solitude and intolerable suspense. Troubles seemed gathering thicker and thicker over her head. Her sorrows seemed more than any human creature could bear. She fully understood now how it was that her husband had taken the poison, which he must have prepared for herself; and awful gratitude to God for her almost miraculous deliverance from the snare struggled in her heart, with grief for the man that she still loved, despite his crimes and cold-blooded villainy, and fear for the consequence to herself and children, should Thugsen die, persisting in his charge against her. And these sorrows and anxieties for herself and her loved ones mingled with others, no less acute, for Ferdinand Canove and his unhappy wife. The hours that were to lead them to the scaffold were swiftly passing away; and she who possessing a guilty secret, might save him, must not breathe it because it would send her dying husband from his death-bed to a jail, and indeed, could not divulge it because she was confined under lock and key, and prevented from holding conversation with any one.

"Surely no sorrows were ever equal to my sorrows," cried Ruth, dropping upon her knees beside the bed, burying her face in the coverlet, and praying and sobbing by turns.

Meanwhile, as the day waned, the shadows of death gathered thickly around the wretched Thugsen. Medical aid had been unavailing except to ameliorate his acute suffering. Every succeeding fit of exhaustion had been more violent, and followed by deeper prostration. The powerful organization that had held out so long against the action of the poison was beginning to show signs of speedy dissolution. The gray hue of death overspread his countenance, the damps of death condensed thickly upon his icy brow; yet his brain, like that of one dying under the effects of strychnine, was singularly clear.

From time to time he spoke as follows:

"Where is my guilty wife? Keep her closely confined. Let her talk with none."

He was always reassured and soothed.

At sunset all hope of his life was abandoned even by the physician, who had "hoped against hope." He could no longer, in conscience, withhold from the wretched patient the knowledge of his true condition. He bent over him, and whispered gently:

"Captain Thugsen——"

The sufferer flared open his eyes, and glared wildly at the speaker.

"Try to compose yourself, and if you have any worldly affairs to settle——"

"You think I am dying!" shrieked the unhappy man, starting up, and falling back exhausted.

"Nor would I, were in the hands of God," said the doctor, gently.

"You said I would not die."

"Nor would I, were any utmost human skill could avail to save you."

"Oh, it must—it must save me! I am not fit to die. Save me, doctor, save me!"

And here followed pleadings of the most frightful terror—anguish of a guilty and cowardly soul on the brink of eternity.

The physician administered a composing draught, and then said, gravely and sweetly:

"Captain Thugsen, the world has reported you, with what justice I know not, a great sinner, but this I would say in the sight of God, a great sufferer. Use the short space that is left you in making restitution, so far as you can, for any wrong you may have committed, and then turn for mercy to Him with whom time and space is as nothing, and sincere repentance the one condition of pardon."

"I cannot! Oh, I cannot!" exclaimed the wretched man [illegible] the most frightful ravings of remorse and despair.

It was long before the united efforts of the physician and the magistrate could soothe his anguish.

"How many hours have I to live?" was then the question of the fast-sinking man.

"You may survive until morning; yet I would advise you to attend at once to any worldly business that you may have at heart, so that your last moments may be entirely given to the care of your soul," said the physician, solemnly.

"Then let every one leave the room except the magistrate, who will bear my statement, and the doctor, who will reduce it to writing," said Thugsen, in a feeble voice.

The chamber was cleared as he desired. A small table was drawn up beside the bed; a lighted lamp, a copy of the Holy Scriptures and writing materials were placed upon it; and the physician and the magistrate seated themselves beside it.

The magistrate duly administered the oath; the doctor prepared his paper and pens; and Robert Thugsen, in a low, feeble voice, made the bitter faintness, commenced his statement.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

We must now return to Cassinove and his devoted wife, whom we left on their way to the prison.

On entering again its gloomy portals, the governor, instead of conducting his prisoner to the clean, light and airy cell he had occupied before his condemnation, led him through the intricate passages of the prison until they reached the ward of the condemned cells that flank the prison yard—dark, dreary, desolate region, where so much guilt and remorse, terror and despair, say, and even innocence and resignation, had entered to suffer and left to die.

Before one of these the governor paused, inserted a key which grated harshly in turning the lock, and conducted the prisoner into the gloomy cell whence he was doomed never to leave forth except to mount the scaffold.

This was the thought that seemed to pass the life from out their hearts.

The judge, in pronouncing sentence, had forbidden them to hope. But the kindly governor, seeing the shrinking of their natures at this crisis, and thinking, perhaps, that a single grain of hope might prove instead of poisoning them, said:

"Keep up your heart, sir; take comfort, ma'am. I know when a man enters one of these places he thinks it is all up with him in the world; but, Lord bless you, it isn't so. No one inexperienced in the ways of courts and prisons would think it, but really about one-half the prisoners who are condemned to death have their sentences commuted, and some get pardoned outright; so hope on to the last, sir. While there's life there's hope, you know, ma'am."

And so saying, Mr. Browning sat his iron lamp upon the stand, and looked around upon the cell.

It was smaller, closer, and darker than the one Cassinove had formerly occupied, and the same bedstead, stand and chair were constructed of the rudest materials.

From utter exhaustion, Laura sank into the chair, and looking at the governor, with beseeching eyes, said:

"How long shall I be permitted to remain with my husband this evening, sir?"

"Until the usual hour of locking up, madam," replied Mr. Browning, in some surprise at the question.

Laura sighed deeply. She had hoped upon this trying occasion that she might be permitted to stay longer.

But the prison rules were very rigid.

"I will leave you with Mr. Cassinove now, madam, and when the hour comes I will send an officer to let you out," said the governor, leaving the cell, and locking the door behind him.

When they were left alone they looked into each other's eyes, and then poor, suffering nature overcame, for an instant, all her heroic resolution, and Laura threw herself upon the neck of Cassinove, and wept bitterly, crying:

"Oh! is there no hope in this world! Oh, that I could die for you, my beloved! my beloved!"

He pressed her in silence to his bosom. He knew that all words would be vain while the fever of grief was raging. But when it had exhausted itself, and she was more composed, he seated her beside himself on the cot, and sought in every way to soothe and comfort her.

"Dearest, it is only death at worst a doom that all must meet in some form or another. And after all, what matters the form? Mine will be a quick and painless exit. Trusting in the advocacy of the Saviour, and the mercy of the Creator, I do not fear the death or the judgment that is to follow it. I fear only to leave my dear Laura alone in the world; and if any circumstance could disturb my last hours on earth or follow me to the "undiscovered," it will be the thought of my beloved wife, sorrowing without hope in the world. Oh, Laura, take courage, my dear wife."

"I will, oh, I will, dearest! It was poor and cowardly in me to weep. I will weep no more. I will be strong, and all our earthly troubles will be over forever; a few more hours and we shall have crossed this dark and rushing river of death, and landed on the other peaceful shore where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest."

"Dearest, do not talk of your dying. This is a bitter trial for you, I know; the bitterest, perhaps, that a woman could be called upon to bear; but you have strength given you to bear up and live!"

"To live! ah, to live for what? I have but you! When you are gone there is no creature on earth whom my life could make better or happier! No, I cannot live; J feel it in every sinking pulse of my heart and brain. That is Heaven's great mercy to me—that I cannot live! Oh, I will not fail too soon! I will see you over the dark river, beloved, and then—then—follow!"

They were interrupted.

The hour of closing the prison had not yet arrived, but the governor, unlocked, and the governor, accompanied by the sheriff and under-sheriff, entered the cell. Upon seeing the prisoner's wife present, the sheriff seemed somewhat embarrassed, and said:

"Had not the lady better retire?"

The governor turned to Laura, and said:

"Will you oblige me by taking leave of your husband now, and withdrawing?"

"No, no! I claim your fulfillment of your promise, Mr. Browning, to let me stay with him up to the last moment before closing. Ah, sir, in mercy do not press me; we have so little time to pass together on this earth that every minute is priceless!" pleaded Laura. "But it will be very painful to you," said the sheriff.

"No more so than what I have already sustained and can yet endure," answered Laura, mournfully.

"Speak to her, Mr. Cassinove," whispered the governor.

"Dearest, be advised, and bid me good-night," urged Cassinove.

"Ah, do not you tell me to go, else I must, you know. Let me stay as long as I may, Ferdinand; and let the sheriff proceed with his duty—the torture of which I can well surmise. What you have to endure, I also can bear," said Laura, resenting herself to his side.

They urged her no more; but the sheriff, taking a document from his pocket, said:

"I have a very painful duty to perform, from witnessing which I would gladly have spared this lady. I hold in my hand the warrant for the execution of Ferdinand Cassinove, at seven o'clock a. m. on Monday next."

And unfolding the warrant, amid the dead silence of the assembled group, he read it aloud to the prisoner.

THE TABLES OF STONE.

A Curious Calculation From the Talmud and the Bible.

Did you ever figure on the probable size and immense strength of Moses, basing your calculations on the dimensions of the tables of stone, as given by the Talmudic writers? In the Talmud (folio 28, column B) it is said that the tables of stone upon which the commandments were written were six ells long, six ells broad and three ells thick. In the Bible, Exodus xxxii. 15, we are told that "Moses went down from the mount, and the two tables of the testimony were in his hand."

"Hand," mind you, not hands, though it must be admitted that it would have taken a strong pair of hands to perform the task of carrying them down on the level. Now, we will put the Talmudic and the Biblical accounts together and apply the mathematical rule. The Hebrew ell or cubit was, at its least estimate, a measure of eighteen inches, which would have made each of the tables a stone block nine feet long, nine feet wide and nine and one-half feet thick. If common stone weighed as much to the square foot then as it does now the tables would tip the beam at about twenty-eight tons! Was Moses one of the giants of those days or has some one made a mistake in calculations or in the statement of supposed facts?—Exchange.

SARDINES.

The Way They Are Cooked and Prepared For Market.

Sardines are caught in nets, and after being cut off and the heads are cut off and the fish are sprinkled lightly with salt. After lying for a few hours they are placed on grids in rows almost perpendicular. The frames are then placed in pans containing boiling olive oil. The oil is changed as soon as it becomes black and dirty for continuing the cooking process.

As soon as the fish are considered sufficiently cooked, they are withdrawn from the pans of oil and the grids are placed on the tables covered with zinc, the surface of the table inclining toward a gutter in the centre, from which they are conducted to a vessel prepared to receive it. Round the table stand the women whose business it is to pack the fish closely in tins and solder them.

The boxes being full, the fish are covered with fresh oil and the lids are then soldered on hermetically. Hermetically sealed they are placed in iron baskets and immersed in boiling water. The smaller boxes are thus boiled for half an hour and the larger ones somewhat longer, in proportion to size of box. The fish are then ready for the market.

The Wearing of Hats.

More or less of a modern habit is the constant wearing of hats. Even as late as 1750 Horace Walpole mentions as a matter of course that he never wears a hat. "Remember," he says, writing to a friend notoriously careless about his dress, who was expected home from Holland, "everybody that comes from abroad is supposed to come from France, and whatever they wear at their first reappearance immediately grows the fashion. Now if, as is very likely, you should bring with you a reverence change hats with the master of a Dutch smack in a week's time we shall all be equipped like Dutch doctors." Walpole spoke very disinterestedly, for, as I never wear a hat myself, it is indifferent to me what sort of a hat I don't wear."

Dangerous.

A contributor to the "Transactions of the Devonshire Association" says that when he came to a certain place a vicar he asked whether there were any cases to be visited.

"Oh, no, sir!" was the answer. "Nobody is ever ill in Berrynarbor. There is an old man, to be sure, over Ilfracombe way taken lately to the bed, but there hain't much the matter with him that I know of."

"I thought to myself," added the vicar, "of the story of the Scotchman who said to his doctor:

"Ye pu' a vara long face, doctor. D'ye think I'm dangerously ill?"

"Na, na," was the reply. 'I don't think ye're dangerously ill, but I think ye're dangerously old.'"

The Missing Key.

One telegraph operator was telling another of a quarrel he had had with his wife, and of a mean trick she played.

"I gave him fits over the wire for about two minutes."

"Indeed! how say?"

"Did not give him a chance to say anything. I just opened the key and he could not come back at me."

"Good-by," put in a bystander, "wouldn't it be fine if we could work a scheme like that in matrimony? Just open the key and that would be the end of it."

Trees.

Authorities on forestry say that seventy-five years are required for the oak to reach maturity; for the ash, larch and elm, about the same length of time; for the spruce and fir, about eighty years. After this time their growth remains stationary for some years, and then decay begins. There are, however, some exceptions to this, for oaks are still living which are known to be 1,000 years old.

Two Feet in Stockings

SHAPE GIVING

ONE OF THE 14

A homely foot can be made handsome by clever dressing. This is true of the face and the figure; why not of the foot?

Being copies of Perfect Feminine Feet the Dolly Varden is a shape giving shoe. It will not succeed in giving to every foot all of the delicate shape and smartness of the perfect Human Foot from which it was copied. We could not claim so much as that. But we do claim that in seven cases out of ten the Dolly Varden shoe will give the foot of its wearer most of the clever lines and exquisite form of the original chef d'oeuvre from which it is a replica.

Is it worth while trying on a few pairs to ascertain what effect they may have on the appearance of your feet? Is it worth while to gamble a little time which may perhaps convert foot homeliness to foot smartness? Purchasers or investigators equally welcome. In both Canada and the States—$3.50 and $4.00. Every pair Goodyear Welted.

TENNYSON'S MOODS.

Eccentric Manner In Which the Poet Received Some Visitors.

It was an eccentric reception that Sir Henry Rosco was given when he visited Lord Tennyson. The former had been unwilling to intrude on the poet, but consented to accompany a friend, William Summers, who had a note of introduction from Sir Lewis Morris. They found Tennyson at lunch. Sir Henry writes of it: "Tennyson at once asked me to sit by him, while Mr. Summers was held in conversation at the other side of the room by Lady Tennyson. The old man began with the words, 'Your name has been before me at every meal,' at which I expressed great astonishment, not thinking that he had ever heard of me.

"And thereupon he produced a small vial containing a few grains on the outside of which was an advertisement containing a few lines of some appreciatory remarks respecting saccharin which I had made in a lecture at the Royal Institute. This notice I had never seen, and on my return home I wrote to the proprietors requesting them to stop issuing such notices, as I could not have my name used for advertising purposes, and this they did.

"As a few minutes, without further conversation, Tennyson rose and said: 'Well, I must bid you goodby, for I must now lie down. I am going to smoke a cigar and go to sleep.' Upon which he walked out of the room, giving a distant nod to my disconsolate friend, Will Summers, who had come on purpose to interview the poet, but with whom he had not exchanged a single word."

Tommy and His Pets.

The British soldier is inordinately fond of his animal pets and has also the reputation of coveting those of his neighbors, particularly dogs and mongooses. Parrots he simply adores, and it is calculated that their strength in the service is in the proportion of at least six birds a Tommy. He is supposed to teach them to be personal in their language, but as a matter of fact Tommy is for some unaccountable reason a very emotional creature, and his birds as often as not have to submit to a sound musical education, hymns being as often taught them as the comic songs of the day.

The Same Old Dish.

Two thousand years ago the chafing dish was used by the Greeks and Romans. It was so popular that it was used for a table ornament, just as several pieces used now are. Pliny relates that the tragic actor, Æsopus, had a dish worth 1,000 sesterces. No doubt then, as at the present time, the actor enjoyed his late midnight meal filled with grateful appreciation of the chafing dish.

An Inspiration.

"Of course," said the new rector, "you hope eventually to reside in a heavenly mansion?"

"Oh, yes," interrupted Miss Uppish, "and I do hope it won't be too close to the heavenly huts of the poor."

Free Trip to Kingston

RAILROAD FARES REFUNDED

Our offer to refund railway fares to out-of-town customers has brought to this store a great deal of extra business—and for the benefit of those who don't already know the particulars we repeat—

DURING DECEMBER we will refund one round trip fare from any place within a radius of twenty-five miles from Kingston to each individual spending not less than twenty-five dollars at this store.

Shorter distances in proportion to mileage such as—

15 miles—one round trip with fifteen dollar purchase.

10 miles—one round trip with twenty dollar purchase.

This offer of free transportation is confined to December only. It should encourage out-of-town people to do their Christmas shopping earlier this year and get the advantage of better selections. Our stock of novelties is complete and better than ever before. We have certain lines that are leaders all the year around.

SILKS, DRESS GOODS, GLOVES, REAL LACE PIECES, NECKWEAR, BEAUTIFUL RIBBONS, READY-TO-WEAR FUR COATS, FURLINED GARMENTS, CLOTH TOURIST COATS, SILK BLOUSES and PETTICOATS, FURS, MILLINERY, Etc.

All the latest fashion ideas—combined with absolute reliability.

This offer merits your attention. Think it over.

Christmas Silk Waists

BY MAIL.

Worth $4.00---Yours for $2.35

OFFER GOOD ONE WEEK MORE.

POSTPAID AND REGISTERED MAIL.

Just such Waists as these are actually sold in Kingston day after day as "extra specials for $2.95 each"—and rightly said to be worth $4. But, by a chance, which we need not explain, we are able to offer one (only) to each mail order customer for the sum of two dollars and thirty-five cents. And more than that, we will prepay the postage and send the Waist by registered mail, so that you can't fail to get it in good condition. The illustration herewith is not exactly like the Waists, but nearly so—they are prettier, and, if possible, even more stylish. If you have some friend away from home, you could not remember her in a better way than by sending her one of these Waists. Tell us her address, and we'll send it direct to her—safe delivery guaranteed. Here is a detailed description of the Waist:

Black or White

Sizes 32 to 42

The Silk used is best quality Japan Wash Silk. The front is made with wide hemstitched tucks and rosettes of pin-tucks running up to the shoulders. The sleeves are very full and wide, with 3-inch cuff filled with small pin-tucks. Back and collar to match. These Waists are well worth $4.00, but you can have your choice of sizes 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42—black or white—each only $2.35

Be sure and say which size you want, and whether black or white. Send money (two dollars and thirty-five cents) by Post Office Order or Express Money Order—with your letter. And remember, that only one will be sold to each customer, and that this offer is good only for one week more from the date of this paper.

If You Are Not Satisfied with Your Waist Say So, and We'll Return Your Money.

COUNTY COUNCIL.

Council met in its last session on Tuesday, 27th Nov., at 2 p.m.

Members all present; Warden Bogart presiding.

Minutes of last day of previous session were read and confirmed.

The following accounts were submitted Sawyer-Massey Co. $8.50 paid; Sawyer-Massey Co. $1.20 paid; Gilbert Furniture Co., 50c paid; Hart & Riddell $15.55; Sawyer-Massey Co. 90c paid; H. Dewey & Son, K.C., $10.00 paid; G. B. Joy $4.00 paid; Sawyer-Massey Co., $8.50; Dominion Manufacturing Co., $758.39; Napanee Water Works Co. $21.64; Victoria Industrial School, $12.50, Mrs. Marmion and Abrams, Alexandra Industrial school for Blind Files, $46.00.

The accounts not paid were referred to the finance committee.

The following report re County roads was subgitted by the Roads and Bridges committee, was read and filed for future reference.

The municipalities in the county are set into the share the amount of $116,000 as follows:

Adolphustown	$ 757 61
Amherst Island	797 20
Bath	3889 91
Camden	3041 92
Ernestown	4 90 94
Fredericksburg	1418 81
Hungerford	3 50
Newburgh	134 06
Richmond	3 50
Sheffield	1129 03
	$16,000 00

Filed for future reference.

Mr. Robt. Reid was heard in respect to the report of the Roads and Bridges committee, the measurements of which are in dispute.

Mr. Milner reported that Mr. J. Yarwood had furnished the machinery to crush the stone for the Centreville gravel pits, on the roads, which he had agreed to do for the prices named.

Moved by Mr. Baker, seconded by Mr. Dougherty, and carried, That F. Mills, civil engineer, be engaged to measure up the gravel at Branchton's and Centreville pits and to take the necessary levels and for the table for future reference.

From Newburgh High School, asking for grant for equipment of Physical Science Class, and Clerk ordered to write to Inspector Ross, asking if Public School for a statement of the attendance of pupils at Branchton's school.

From Board of Education of Napanee, asking for grant of $2,000.00. The Clerk was instructed to ask for particulars of the grant asked for, and the communication was laid on the table.

A report of the Special committee to investigate the claims of Messrs. Creighton and Miller, re the payment of money by Mr. Creighton on Cosse's Lane, on the Hamburg Road, stating that they were unable to settle the dispute, there being a question as to the sewer having been put in by the plaintiffs, and the moving expenses of the machinery. Dougherty and Miller, Mr. Creighton contends that the total over expenditure should be borne by South Fredericksburg. They therefore desire to refer the matter back to the Council for their final settlement. The payment of the order given to Mr. Creighton was still withheld.

The report was laid on the table until to-morrow morning.

Council adjourned until 9.30 a.m. to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY—SECOND DAY.

Council met at 10 a.m.; members all present. Warden presiding. Minutes of yesterday were read and approved.

COMMUNICATIONS

From County of Dalton, submitting report of a committee of that Council, in which recommendation is made to the Legislature of Ontario to abolish fees of Justice, and asking this Council to endorse it, and if they concur in the recommendation's report, to submit a memorial to the Government that the changes suggested be made. Referred to Judge Madden for his consideration.

From Herrington, Warner and Grange, threatening actions against the County for damages to Mr. C. H. Spencer's threshing engine at Wiggins Bridge, Belleville Road, and also an accident to Mr. Spencer on the Deseronto Road, at Birrell's Bridge. The damages claimed are, for Deseronto road accident, $77.50; at Wiggins' bridge, $54.27. The accidents referred to occurred on 27th and 29th of Sept. last, the bridge breaking down under the weight of the heavy machinery at Wiggins', and the combination at the Birrell bridge occurred on account of approach to Birrell's bridge being out of repair. Referred to Roads and Br dges committee with instructions to investigate the circumstances of the Birrell bridge accident, and to obtain legal advice in the matter.

From report of the Warden and Clerk, orders issued since last session, were read and adopted.

Col. Cliff submitted several accounts for repairs required for repairs to county road machinery when in use in connection with the road division, $56. Referred to Roads and Bridges committee.

From W. P. Dawson, Registrar of Court, submitting list of Grand Jury report, in which it was recommended that the Grand Jury room be painted, floor shed, and the electric light installed in the County hall.

Moved by Mr. Martin, seconded by Mr. Reid, That the Chairman of County Property committee be instructed to have hall lighted by electricity.

From Mr. Peter Anderson, P.S.I., stating that he had not yet been paid his salary as Inspector of Separate Schools for County, and asking that same be paid.

Moved by Mr. Mowat, seconded by Mr. Baker, the matter was laid on the table until to-morrow morning, and that the two school inspectors be asked to attend the speech.

Mr. Martin presented an account for $6.50 for boarding for Mink's, Xavier's and Brandon's for dogs, $412.77, from Wm. Anderson.

Moved by Col. Clyde, seconded by Mr. Fisher, that the Warden, Mr. Martin and the mover be a special committee to examine and adjust County Council accounts. Motion carried.

Account, C. A. Anderson, $1.00, was paid.

Moved by Col. Clyde, seconded by Mr. Paul, that the following continuation grants be paid: Napanee Separate School the Government grants, Math, $175.00; S. S. No. 12, Ernestown, $22.50, S. S. No. 7, South Fredericksburgh, $22.50.

Council adjourned till 2 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Council met at 2 p.m.

His Honor Judge Madden was heard in respect to the communication from the County of Hastings.

Mr. Baker, Q.C., was heard from the matter sufficiently that as far as he could see the object was to do away with the division and county courts, and make all cases go to high court. As that is the object, there would then be no more county court. He fancied that the matter had already been dealt with by the department.

Mr. Leslie Bruce was thanked for the kind explanation and information by had furnished the Council.

Mr. Martin stated that Mr. Miller had declined to make the measurements at Brandon's bridge, and the Clerk was instructed to phone Mr. W. B. Ayleworth, Belleville, to see if his services could be secured. Mr. Aylesworth was communicated with, but said he was now fully employed, and that he would be unable to undertake the work.

Mr. J. C. VanDyck was heard relative to his account for use of machinery on the county road, and on motion of Messrs. Miller and Paul, an order was given by Mr. VanDyck for $231 for the use of his crusher for twenty-one days, same to be charged to the County roads machinery account.

Mr. Bruce Shaver, an old County Councillor was present and was asked to address the Board on the new and old County Councils Act, and made a short speech. He said that the Act as it was at present of more interest to him than to the County Council, as it made a mistake in its new legislation, and that the County Council could not do what it can to remedy it. As it now is, those who had to pay for our schools had no say in the matter, and the duties of school trustees do not fall on the County Council. The County Council Act, he did not know what it was, but the same in principle of these jackets this fall store is selling them at less than wholesale prices.

Balance of report next week.

A MODERN FUR STORE.

Not even in Toronto or Montreal would be found a larger or better stock of Ladies' Persian Lamb Jackets than in George Mills & Co.'s big fur store, Kingston. In spite of the advance in price of these jackets this fur store is selling them at less than

Women

To cure your headache, colds, and monthly pains without laying the foundation for diseased heart, nerves or stomach, remember there is only one safe remedy to take, and that is the purely vegetable one from Japan

Zutoo

The Gentle Kidney Cure.

Don't think that Bu-Ju is not effective because it does not "tear things loose." The man, who talks most, does least. Kidney remedies that purge—and over-stimulate the kidneys—upset the stomach...are going to do you mighty little good.

Bu-Ju

goes about curing you gently, mildly, correctly. You never know you are taking medicine—expect that you begin to get better and keep on getting better. Bu-Ju heals inflammation in the kidneys—takes away that sharp pain in the back and the dull ache through the hips—stops excessive urination—and enables the diseased portions of the kidneys to heal and strengthen.

Cures Rheumatism Too.

Dr. Hugo's Health Tablets for Women

Make Healthy Women.

Upon being taken into the stomach, the various ingredients are absorbed by the blood, and then find their way to every organ and tissue.

Some reach the uterine system. These allay inflammation, stop all drains on the system and make women regular.

Some strengthen the stomach. They help digestion and increase the appetite.

Others act on the bowels. They cure constipation.

Other ingredients stimulate the liver and kidneys in carrying off impurities from the system.

Others reach the nerves. These tone up the nervous system and supply vital energy, thereby making the nervousness, irritability, and melancholy, to which so many women are subject.

The full effect of all the medicaments in the tablets is to arouse the entire female system to renewed life and vigor.

Improvement is noticed the first week.

Loss of The Resolute.

SIX OF HER CREW FOUNDERED FROM SMALL BOAT.

Toronto, Ont., Nov. 22.—The steambarge Resolute, owned by Stacey & Miller, contractors, foundered off the western gap this morning. In an effort to reach the shore in a small boat, six of the crew were lost. They are: John Harrison, chief engineer, Deseronto; Thomas Topping, second engineer, Deseronto; David White, deckhand, Prescott; Harry Gregor, fireman, Bath, England; John Burns, fireman, Port Colborne; Nels Nellson, wheelsman, Sweden.

The Resolute with her consort, the Locke, was from Erie, with coal for Rogers & Co., and the latter had been trying off the western gap since two o'clock yesterday morning waiting for the weather to moderate, so as to get into Toronto harbor.

At 4.30 this morning Capt. John Sullivan, of election fame, who was in command, saw that the Resolute was likely to go to pieces, and determined to try and reach shore in one of the boats. One of the boats containing six men was upset in the surf, and all on board were drowned. Missing, and probably are drowned —all of barge Resolute:

John Harrison, chief engineer, Deseronto.

Thomas Topping, assistant engineer, Deseronto.

David White, sailor, Prescott.

Harry Gregory, fireman, Toronto.

John Barnes, sailor, Port Colborne.

Nelson Neilson, sailor, Toronto.

Members of Resolute crew saved:

Captain John Sullivan, manager, Toronto.

Capt. John Fahey, master, St. Catharines.

Michael Haney, mate, Buffalo.

Andrew Hedon, sailor, wheelman.

Ernest Marchetti, sailor, Toronto.

Mrs Lizzie Callaghan, cook, Toronto.

Toronto, Nov. 23.—Further particulars of the loss of the steam barge Resolute near the western entrance to Toronto Bay say that, unable to enter the Eastern Gap, the vessel tried the Western, but was likewise unable to enter there owing to the fact that her draft was only seven feet of water in the channel. After three futile attempts she went on the rocks. The Resolute was formerly owned by the Rathbun Company, of Deseronto, and was valued at $14,000. There was no insurance.

Captain Sullivan's escape was probably the narrowest and most thrilling on record which even that hardy maritime city has had. He had been in her his ever passed. In the vicinity of the Resolute on a couple of trips this fall, but this time was the closest only as the crow flies to the towers. On Tuesday morning Captain Sullivan called at the office of Ross, representing Messrs. Haney and Miller, and Peter Miller reported that all was well, although it had been rough and going over. Yesterday morning he came ashore to tell the company that they were afraid they could not enter. "I'll go back and make a watch for a chance to get right," he remarked cheerfully to Mr. Ross. About four o'clock the Resolute started to be went. When the vessel broke up, about an hour later, the captain managed to launch the life-boats. One had already been smashed, and as the crew endeavored to cut away another he was swept into the lake. Finally he got away from the turbulent waves. With the skill and strength of experience he managed the boat that was afloat. Clinging to the side, he managed to get around to the back and see if they could rescue any others. As they attempted to turn, the boat went over and those in her went into the water. Captain Sullivan's rabbi floated past and Captain Sullivan said "Thomas Topping gone." There was only a piece of wreckage, but it was one of the life-boats, and in it these struggling men. Topping seemed to the captain to be exhausted, and you'll be all right," and the undaunted captain kept up the struggle with hope. The piece of effort to reach the piece of wreckage to which the life-boat was fast. Then the captain had his hands torn and bruised by the rough iron and rung on to tenaciously as a man with grim death clutches at the face. His watch stopped at 4.10, which would therefore have been the time when he fell into the water. All about was dark and cold. One moment he and his comrade would be under water, the next above. Before the stiff nor-wester which was blowing they were carried at a rapid rate in the direction of the Western Gap. Just opposite the Gap and safety seemed in sight, the wreckage broke up into two and the men parted.

"Good-by," gasped Topping, feeling that his last hope had vanished.

"Keep up your courage, we are near shore," answered back the captain as he was tossed away by the waves.

For a time it looked as though he would be landed on the beach, but the wave swept him seaward through the Gap on to the shore. He saw a yacht and called for help. His cries were heard and he was saved. Almost unconscious from exhaustion, he was taken to his home at 575 Euclid avenue, where he was kept warm and he was reported to be feeling all right today.

Those lost went down in the first trip. The last trip was made by Captain Sullivan and his crew.

PRESENTATION TO MR. AND MRS. D. R. ROSE.

On Friday evening, Nov. 23rd, at the close of the R. E. service in the Methodist church, Tamworth, the pastor took the chair. After the singing of a hymn by the congregation, he called upon Mr. and Mrs. D. R. Rose to come forward, when Miss Ivy E. Wells, in behalf of the congregation, read the following address:

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Rose,—We, a few of your friends and fellow members of the Methodist congregation, Tamworth, have gathered this evening, to testify to you our kindly feelings to-ward you, and assure you of our appreciation of your work. We thank you heartily for the aid you have given to us in our worship to God, during all these years, and also Mr. Rose, by his genial, and sunny control of the choir and the singing of the congregation, has not only relieved his pastor of many a worry, but has helped largely to develope and perfect that part of the service.

Mrs. Rose has presided with grace and skill at the organ, and led through these years in the expression of our grateful praise to Heaven. We regret now to lose the benefit which your experience and judgment might give, and to place in other hands the work that you so long have guided, but trust that we shall still hear your voices in song and recitation for many years to come.

We give to Mrs. Rose this evening, as an evidence and imperfect token of our gratitude, a china cabinet, which we hope she will accept, not because of its worth, but that it may long be with us as a token that you hold in our esteem, and the love that your friends bear towards you both.

Signed in behalf of the congregation,
Mrs. J. W. Fuller,
Mrs. Lt. Brandon,
Miss Ivy E. Wells.

Mr. Rose replied in a few well chosen words, thanking the choir and congregation for their assistance in the work. Mr. Rose has been choir leader and Mrs. Rose organist for over quarter of a century, and reached a short time ago to enjoy a well earned rest.

IN TIME OF PEACE.

In the first months of the Russian-Japan war we had a striking example of the necessity for preparation and early action. Those who, so to speak, "have shingles their roofs in dry weather," by virtue of experience has made history and given to us our greatest lesson. The individual as well as the nation should be prepared for any emergency. Are you prepared to successfully combat the first cold you take? A cold can be cured much more quickly when treated as soon as it has been contracted and before it has become settled in the system. Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is famous for its cures of colds and it should be kept and used ready for instant use. For sale at The Rexall Drug Store. 44c

JOSEPH GLENN REMOVES TO WINNIPEG.

Elm Creek Mail.

Elm Creek, Man., Nov. 20.—Much regret is felt in this district at the removal of Joseph Glenn, to Winnipeg, which took place on Friday last. Mr. Glenn has resided on 18-8-5, two miles south-west of Elm Creek, for the last ten years, and was one of the most active farmers in the district.

Despite the strenuousness of farming life, Mr. Glenn found time to serve his fellow citizens in various public offices, and was for a number of years in the council of the old municipality of Differin and was serving a second term when the division took place. He was unanimously elected to the new council of Grey municipality but in view of his contemplated removal was unable to accept the office. He was school trustee for four years, and was one of the most active in favor of our fine new school house a few months ago. The year that he was assessor not one appeal was laid before the court of revision. Mr. Glenn has also been active in lodge life. He was Inspector of No. 1, L.L., and still holds the position of Inside Guard in the Masonic lodge.

Mr. Glenn contemplates going into the real estate business in Winnipeg. Mr. Glenn is a former resident of the Township of Camden, and his many friends here will be pleased to hear of his prosperity.

Indigestion

Stomach trouble is but a symptom of, and not in itself a true disease. We think of Dyspepsia, Heartburn, and Indigestion as real diseases, but they are symptoms only of a certain specific Nerve sickness—nothing else.

It was this fact that first correctly led Dr. Shoop in the creation of that most very popular Stomach Rem dy—Dr. Shoop's Restorative. Going direct to the stomach nerves, alone brought that success and favor to Dr. Shoop and his Restorative. Without that original and highly vital principle, no such lasting accomplishments were ever to be had.

For stomach distress, bloating, biliousness, bad breath and sallow complexion, try Dr. Shoop's Restorative—Tablets or Liquid—and see for yourself what it can and will do. We sell and cheerfully recommend

The Bridal Eve

Cassinove heard it with composure, and at its close bowed, still in silence.

The sheriff said that any privilege or indulgence, within the rules of the prison, would be promptly extended to the prisoner, upon his application, and, with a deferential bow to Laura, he called his satellites, and retreated from the cell.

When left alone again, the unhappy pair remained seated side by side, their hands clasped together in utter silence. No word had passed their lips since the reading of the death warrant. Although by what had gone before, they were prepared for what was, to come, yet the reading of the doom seemed to have stunned them into stillness. Cassinove was the first to shake off the spell and speak.

"My own brave wife! you bore the ordeal well!" he said.

"I will bear all the rest well, until all is over, and then—follow you!" said Laura.

They remained mutually comforting each other for some fifteen minutes longer, and then the turnkey came his rounds, and informed Mrs. Cassinove that she must withdraw for the night. And Laura took leave of her husband, leaving him alone in his cell, and returned to her own desolate lodgings.

Leaving Newgate, Laura threaded the narrow, dark and filthy courts and alleys of that miserable quarter, crowded, as they were with abandoned wretches of both sexes. She reached, at last, her own gloomy lodging house, at the top of Skinner street, within sight of St. Sepulchre's Church. On the opposite side of the street she saw a close carriage, with a coachman, whom she thought she recognized. But, too much absorbed by her own anguish, she gave no thought to the circumstance, but entered at once her dreary lodgings, where no kind friend welcomed her, where she was always alone in her grief, as was the Divine Master in Gethsemane.

She crept slowly and feebly up the dark staircase to the landing upon which her room was situated. She saw a tender, subdued light, shining from the partly-open door, and her heart, broken down by sorrow, sunk with a strange foreboding of more misery, if more could come to one whose cup was already overflowing.

She timidly pushed open the door and entered.

And the next moment she was clasped in the arms of Rose. Poor Rose was no philosopher, and all she could do now was to clasp her friend to her loving bosom, and sob forth:

"Oh, my dear, dear Laura! my dear, dear Laura! my best friend for you. Oh, may the Lord comfort you, Laura, for no human being can, I know!"

"This is very kind, Rose, to leave your pleasant palace home, and come to such an abode of misery as this," said Laura, in an exhausted voice.

"Oh, did you think I could stay at home, knowing that you were alone, and suffering here? Oh, no; as soon as the news of the verdict reached us, I got ready, and ordered the carriage, and drove here. I have been here an hour. I know you were at the prison, and I should have gone thither, but I thought you would prefer being alone with him this evening; so I waited for you here."

"Bless you, Rose! but the duke, did he approve of your coming?"

"My dear husband! Ah, I see you do not know him yet. Yes, he approved of my coming; he thinks you should not remain alone in this dread trfon; he made me promise to bring you back to Bereseleigh House to-night, if I could persuade you to come. Do, dearest Laura! You shall live as privately as you like; not even a strange servant shall intrude on you. I have a nook for your own old maid, and your old footman, who both love you, and they shall serve you in your own apartments. You can have a close carriage appropriated to your sole use, and so visit the prison as often as in the morning as you like. It will be just as convenient for you to ride from Bereseleigh House as to walk from Skinner street, and will take no more time. And Mr. Cassinove himself will feel more tranquil when he knows you are among friends, for, Laura, you shall never leave us more with our consent; you shall be our adopted sister, dearer than all other sisters. You do not answer me. Oh, Laura, consent, dearest," pleaded Rose, pressing her friend to her bosom with nervous eagerness. They were, by this time, seated on the threadbare sofa, side by side, Rose having her arms clasped around Laura, who answered:

"I thank and bless you, sweet Rose, but I cannot avail myself of your loving kindness."

"Oh, Laura, don't say so! Dearest Laura, take pity on me; my heart is bleeding for your woes and his, and bleeding all the more, because—oh, Heaven!—I feel myself so weak, so utterly powerless to give you any saving help. Oh! let me do what I can, or my heart will break outright," cried Rose, bursting into a paroxism of tears, and clasping closely the friend she longed to succor.

"Sweet, loving Rose, ask your own woman-heart if I could bear to enter a home of luxury while my husband suffers in the condemned cell? No, Rose, no; the very desolation and wretchedness of my abode gives me a sort of comfort," said Laura, mournfully.

"But if not for yourself, and not for me, for Mr. Cassinove's sake, he will come with me! He would be happier if he knew you were with us. It would remove the only anxiety he can have, to know that you were safe with dear friends, who would love you as a sister all their days," urged Rose.

"Dearest child, your affection inspires you with very specious arguments, but they will not do for me. I must remain here, for here I feel in every respect near to my husband."

"Say you will not be persuaded to so with me?" wept Rose.

"No, my pitying angel, because I cannot; but I bless you from my deep heart for your love."

"Very well, then: if you will not go with me, I will stay with you," said the young duchess.

"Rose!" exclaimed Laura, in mournful astonishment.

wildly uttering the thought that was in her mind.

"Base poor et sans reproche, he is not afraid to die or meet his Divine Judge," said Rose.

"But, oh, to think that the miscreant for whose crime he suffers walks abroad at large!"

"Do you suspect, then, who did the deed?"

"I more than suspect it. I know it in my heart of hearts. I caused the wretch to be arrested and examined before a magistrate, but there seemed to be no evidence to warrant the indictment of the guilty man, although there was sufficient to convict the innocent one."

"May you not be mistaken, then, dear Laura?"

Laura shook her head in bitterness of spirit.

"Who is it then, dear Laura, that you suspect of this crime?"

"One whose name is odious throughout Europe for an unnatural and monstrous deed, for which he is no longer in danger of justice, since Sir Vincent Lester, the only witness against him, is dead."

"You mean—" exclaimed Rose, catching her breath.

"Robert Thugsen. But what is the matter, dear Rose?"

"Oh, Laura, did you know—did you know this miscreant is my persecutor also?"

"No; you astonish me. I thought it was a Captain Rutherford, of the Tenth Hussars."

"No; that was only the feigned name under which he tried to marry me. Shall I tell you all about it, Laura? Perhaps my narrative may throw some light upon your suspicions."

"Yes, dearest," replied her friend, hoping to learn some new facts that might, even at this late hour, save the guiltless.

Rose commenced, and related the whole history of her broken marriage, as she had already narrated it to the duke.

While she spoke, Laura raised herself up from the sofa, and gazed earnestly at the speaker, and when Rose had finished her own narrative, Laura said:

"And is this the man who dares to claim your hand, and start a criminal prosecution on his claim?"

"Yes, Is it not infamous?"

"It is imbecile Oh, that we had had an understanding before. If it would have saved you from much anxiety, I could have told you a month ago, what I tell you now. The man has a wife and children now living."

Rose gasped for breath, as she sprang nearer her friend, and gazed wildly into her face, exclaiming;

"Is this so? Do you know it of your own knowledge? Where is the woman?"

Laura sank back upon the sofa. She had spoken too quickly and too much—more than she could prove. She did not know of her own knowledge that Thugsen had a wife; she had only the word of the self-styled wife, who did not even bear his name, and who had behaved very strangely in running

ACHING KIDNEYS.

MADE SOUND AND STRONG BY DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS.

There is probably no one in the town of Paris, Ont., who does not know Mr. Samuel G. Robinson, and who will not readily accept his word when he says that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cured him of an obstinate case of kidney trouble after other remedies had failed to give him more than temporary relief. To a reporter the Mail-Transcript of Mr. Robinson freely gave permission to publish a statement of his case in the hope that his experience might benefit some other sufferer. He said: "I have suffered from kidney trouble for about three years. Sometimes my back ached so severely that I was unable to work, and at times it was almost impossible for me to stoop or straighten up. I had to urinate very frequently and often had to get up several times during the night. At different times I was under the care of doctors, but I only got relief for a time. I also tried a number of medicines and backache plasters, but none of them helped me and I began to think the trouble could not be cured. One day during a conversation with a friend he asked me why I did not try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, saying that he had used them and they had done him much good. I decided to try the pills and it was not long before I felt greatly benefited. I continued using the pills for some time longer and was glad to say that every vestige of the trouble has disappeared and I am now as well as ever. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have proved a blessing to me and I gladly recommend them to anyone similarly afflicted."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are the greatest cure in the world for all troubles common ailments of men and women—for all weaknesses and wearing aches and headaches and headaches of anaemia; all the heaviness and dullness of indigestion; all the pains and aches of rheumatism, sciatica and neuralgia, and all the ill health and disturbance of regularity in the blood supply or nerve force. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People go to the root of the trouble at once by making new, rich, red blood. They strike straight at the common cause of disease. But you must get the genuine pills with the full name Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People on the wrapper around each box. "Yes, I will, Laura: I will, dear sister of my heart. I will stay with you all through these bitter hours to the very last. When you go to the scaffold to see Cassinove, I will be here to receive you in my arms when you come back," said Rose, resolutely.

"And when all is over, I will carry you off to Bereseleigh House, never to leave us more," she added, mentally.

"But, Rose, darling, I must not permit you to remain here."

"But I will, Laura, do you hear!" replied the young duchess, obstinately. Then, suddenly changing her tone, she once more threw her arms passionately around her friend, and pressed her, weeping, to her heart, saying: "Oh, you would not be so cruel as to rend me from you now, when you are in such bitter trouble; do not, Laura! To leave you so would almost be my death."

"But the duke, Rose?"

"Oh, my dear husband permits his poor Rose to do just as she pleases, so that she pleases to do right. I had provided for this contingency. I told him if I could not bring you with me, I should remain with you."

"And he consented?"

"Yes, for he knew it would make me ill to leave you alone in your sorrow."

"And can you think so much of me and my sorrows when you have so heavy a trouble of your own?"

A paller like death suddenly overspread the face of the young duchess, as she murmured, in a frightened tone:

"Yes, oh, yes, I have not forgotten that; but I must not think of it—it will do no good; I must think of you. Oh, Laura, how pale and thin you are! how faint your voice is! You have utterly neglected yourself; you have taken no refreshment since the morning, have you?"

"Nothing but a glass of wine; I could not, you know."

"Then I must make you take something at once—for his sake, Laura, for your frame may be strengthened for your duties to-morrow," said Rose, ingeniously, getting up to search the room, and hurrying:

"Is there a bell in this dreary place? and who waits on you, dear Laura?"

"On Monday, replied Laura, touching the bell that was at her elbow.

The rope was promptly answered. The summons. Her sharp eye had noticed the ducal coronet upon the carriage, and the liveried servants that attended to it, and she had guessed the rank of Laura's visitor, though she was unable to surmise the cause of the visit.

"My friend, your lodger here is not well. Will you be kind enough to prepare a basin of strong beef tea as quickly as you can?" said the young duchess.

"Certainly, madam, your ladyship—I mean your grace," answered Mrs. Brown, stopping a moment to swallow with her eyes the apparition of a loving duchess in her dominions, and then courtesying and retiring.

"Beef tea will be the best thing for you to take, dear Laura; it will give you the strength you need, and you can take that when you cannot force nature to receive anything else."

"You shall do as you please with me here, sweet Rose."

In due time the much-needed restorative was brought, and Rose gently obliged her exhausted friend to partake of it. Soon after which, she made Laura lie down upon the sofa, while she sat beside it.

"Now shut your dear eyes and try to take some rest," urged Rose.

But not for an instant did those tired eyelids close upon those "tired eyes." Rose saw how it was, and said:

"Oh, if you cannot compose yourself to rest, dear Laura, speak, utter all that is in your heart: it is better than suppressing your feelings; anything is better than lying there in silence, and gazing into vacancy with those awful eyes."

"Rose, Rose, he is to die at seven on Monday morning!" exclaimed Laura, wildly uttering the thought that was in her mind.

"Base poor et sans reproche, he is not afraid to die or meet his Divine Judge," said Rose.

"But, oh, to think that the miscreant for whose crime he suffers walks abroad at large!"

The First Blankets.

In the reign of Edward III. there were at Bristol three brothers who were eminent clothiers and woolen weavers and whose family name was Blanket. They were the first persons who manufactured that comfortable material which has ever since been called by their name and whose was then used for peasants' clothing.

Sugar Mills.

The machinery of the modern sugar mill is so complete that from the time the cane enters the crushing rolls until the same is emptied from the vacuum pans no human labor is required to manipulate it.

Butterflies.

Butterflies are considered nutritious and delicious food by the aborigines of Australia.

Eye Color.

The gray eye is an almost universal characteristic of people of great intellect. Black eyes indicate an ardent temper, while light blue eyes, which are found chiefly among the Scandinavians, denote a cheerful disposition and a constant nature.

Unique Sundial.

In the grounds adjacent to Wentworth castle, in England, is to be seen a unique sundial which is composed of a fine yew tree for the pin and closely cropped box bushes for the Roman figures and borderings. It was planted over 200 years ago and is still in a good state of preservation. Its time-keeping compares favorably with sundials of more modern construction.

Baldness.

When baldness first makes its appearance the scalp is usually tight, and a few applications of goose oil will loosen it and furnish food for the tissues of the skin.

Bridge Designer's Curious Wish.

Henley bridge, in England, was designed about 1786 by Thomas Hayward, who expressed the wish that he might die ere the work was commenced and that his body might be interred under the center pier. He died before the bridge was completed, but was buried in the churchyard close by.

St. Petersburg is the coldest capital in Europe, the temperature in winter sometimes reaching 50 degrees below zero.

Expectation of Life.

According to the English table of expectation of life, of 1,000,000 children born the survivors at the age of sixty would be 182,350 males and 187,477 females, of twenty years later there would be 114,870 males and 123,607 females, or a total of 237,977.

Trees in Sicily.

The ancient poets used to sing of the dense forests of Sicily. Today the mountains are bare of timber, and the reforestation is a difficult one. Attempts at starting new growth are frustrated by the peasants, who tear down fences and drive in their goats. Only military protection could new forest trees be grown.

Neapolitan Cab Horses.

Neapolitan cab horses are all stallions of a diminutive breed. They are driven without a bit. The bridle carries a device for closing the nostrils, operated by the reins.

Knights' Chargers.

During the middle ages so heavily burdened were the knights with their armor and that of their riders that only the largest and strongest animals could be employed. Prisoner says that 3,000 knights and 700 pounds weight was carried by a knight's charger.

Drink and Food.

The average man takes five and a half pounds of food and drink each day, amounting to a ton of solid and liquid nourishment annually. In seventy years he eats and drinks 1,000 times his own weight.

Eating Arsenic.

The practice of eating arsenic is very common among peasants in the mountainous districts of Hungary and France. They claim that the poison enables them to ascend great heights without experiencing any difficulty in breathing.

Diamond Test.

There is a very easy and simple way to tell if a diamond is genuine, says an expert. Make a small dot on a piece of paper with a lead pencil and look at it through the diamond. If it shows but a single dot, the diamond is genuine. If it shows more than one or the mark appears scattered, it is false.

Italian Cigars.

Italian cigars look like Pittsburg stogies, with bits of straw sticking out of them.

The Funeral Bell.

The tolling of a bell at a funeral is a purely pagan custom. The idea was to drive away evil spirits. Funeral bells are known to have been used by the church in the sixth century A. D.

A Bag of Coins.

At Lullingsbone castle, the Kentish residence of Sir William and Lady Emily Tart-Dyke, is preserved a leather bag of coins. The tradition is that whenever the heir is married he and his bride must place a coin in the bag. The legend further enjoins that this matrimonial offertory bag must never be counted or some dire misfortune will overtake the newly wed couple.

Gold Abrasion.

A gold coin passes from one hand to another 2,000,000,000 times before the stamp or impression upon it becomes obliterated by friction, while a silver coin changes hands 1,250,000,000 times before it becomes entirely defaced.

From Sour to Sweet.

A plant in tropical Africa has a fruit which can change the flavor of the most acid substance into a delicious sweetness. It is seldom found near the coast. The fruit resembles a small plum with the seed invested in a thin soft, pulp, wherein lies the peculiar sweetening property.

BARRETT.

On the 21st inst., the messenger death visited this neighborhood, and carried away Mr. Elias Thompson, one of our oldest and most revered residents. On Saturday previous to his demise, he was stricken by the stroke, rendering him with a severe attack, rendering him unconscious, in which state he remained until his death. Apparently enjoyed until his death. Apparently Mr. Thompson was in good health until his last illness. Owing to his kindly and generous disposition he held a high place in the hearts of all those with whom he was acquainted. While he led an humble and rather secluded life, yet that life was enabled by deeds of charity. He was ever found doing some little kindness for the poor, and always enjoyed the privilege of his Master and Lord. Mr. Thompson leaves a wife, six sons and three daughters to mourn his loss.

While Mr. William Neat was returning home from Napanee last Saturday, the horses became unmanageable and ran away, throwing him from his wagon. He sustained a few fractures. We hope for his speedy recovery.

Mrs. William French remains very low.

A number from this vicinity attended the funeral of Mrs. Fraser Hoch, on Monday last.

A GUARANTEED CURE FOR PILES.

Itching, Blind, Bleeding, Protruding Piles. Druggists are authorized to refund money if PAZO OINTMENT fails to cure in 6 to 14 days. 50c.

Window and Picture Glass.

A shipment of English glass (Pilkington's) just in at Wallace's Red Cross Drug Store. This is the cleanest glass possible to buy. The picture glass is just the thing for Passe-Partout Work. We cut it to any size. T. B. Wallace.

The Largest in Napanee.

Wallace's Red Cross Drug Store is showing the largest assortment of Rubber goods and sick room supplies in Napanee—atomizers, syringes, hot water bottles, rubber gloves, etc. The Beaver Hot Water Bottle is without exception the best value in Canada.

The Christmas Stocks Are Ready.

We have over sixty thousand dollars worth of goods in this immense store. During December will sell about one fourth of that.

There is seldom a day without receipts of merchandise here—but this is just as true; almost every choice thing in distinctly givable goods is here now.

We shall be very busy next month. Isn't is worth your while to buy Christmas gifts now? Your comfort is something—for wonderfully large and roomy as this store is, its facilities are taxed after the first few days of December.

Then think of the charm of first choice! Four fifths of the best gift things we have—chiefly imported—couldn't be re-bought by us for Christmas, no matter how badly we wanted them.

All the fancy Hkfs. are mounted separately on colored paper and the selling price is in plain figures. Just such Hkfs. as are wanted for personal use and later for giving. The plain and hemstitched linens are in book form. In a big lot of samples like this where there are some 500 kinds, we did not think it fair to average a price. Each Hkf. is marked separately at the reduced price. See window display of them. Should be enough to make buy Hkf. sel ing for several days. Enough for mail orders.

We have a big case of beautiful gift boxes to distribute among those who do their Xmas trading early in December.

Stanfield's Unshrinkable Underwear.

This is the one and the only one make of underwear for men that is absolutely all wool and yet will not shrink. STANFIELD'S WILL NOT SHRINK. Our trade for this make grows every season. Last week we received an order from Oregon, Illinois, for three suits with the remarks that they could find no other line so good. They had purchased some here before moving to the States. Just now as this ad. is being writteu a customer is buying 5 suits—says that he bought a suit earlier in the season for one son and now he finds it so good that he wants it for the whole family. A new suit for one that shrinks—this is our guarantee.

Children's Sleepers or Kickers.

OPEN LETTER TO THE BEAVER.

Dear Editor,—A special meeting of the ratepayers of S. S. No. 13, Richmond, was called on Nov. 27th, for the trustees, to discuss the very drastic amendments to the Public Schools Act passed by the Ontario Legislature at its last session, and to if possible devise ways and means to lighten the very burdensome taxes as deemed unfairly placed upon rural school supporters. The meeting was very representative, and after lengthy discussions, a resolution was presented, requesting the trustees to close the school for at least three months, beginning Jan. 1st, 1907, and that the motion was not made with a view entirely of curtailing expenses, but as well that this section put in an equal request to the Minister of Education for the arbitrary and unjust law he has placed upon us, which action was carried unanimously and with out a dissenting voice, and it is with feelings of deep regret that this trustees have to advise Miss Dora Casey, our beloved and devoted teacher, who is just closing her eighth year with us, with these facts.

Now, Mr. Editor, not wishing to take up too much space, but a few words might not be out of place. As to the requirement, I think the Hon. the Minister of Education, must be a man of great mind to think of so much, or else his mind must have been wandering. If there was anything more he possibly could have added he no doubt would have done so. And just to finish the Honorable gentleman sitting in his easy chair in the Parliament Buildings, Toronto, knows so much better the requirements of the individual school sections throughout the Province than do the three trustees in this section, men supposed to possess at least ordinary intelligence. And again the law is unfair. It demands for the rich and against the man of ordinary wealth, as I know of men who have undergone privations of various kinds to educate their children, and now have them about ready to go forth in our Model Schools at home. But now they find the law requires them to send them to some distant city to finish at the Normal, and to do this they are required to pay over $200.00 or $300.00, which is beyond their ability to do. Consequently the light house that once existed will have all vanished, and the strenuous efforts and privations that the parent and child have heretofore undergone to bring them up to this point, now passes into oblivion. "Consistency thou art a Jewel." Are we a free people? This is the first step in the fair Province of ours, to compel and such law should not be allowed to deface the statutes of Ontario. We are long we will wake up and ask our worthy member, we are in the year of Province of Ontario, or in downtrodden Russia under the throne of the Czar.

Thanking you, Mr. Editor, for space, I am

THANKSGIVING SERMON

CAUSES WHICH OUGHT TO INSPIRE A NATION'S GRATITUDE.

FOUR HISTORIC MOVEMENTS

Rev. Dr. Talmage Recalls to the Memories of His Hearers Those Upon Which the Life of the United States Hung Upon the Slenderest Thread — Reached Happy Solution With Reference to the Republic's Own Life.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1900, by Frederick Diver, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 25.—In this Thanksgiving sermon dr. Talmage reviews the many causes which ought to inspire a nation's gratitude and arouse its patriotism. The text is Deuteronomy viii, 10, "Thou shalt bless the Lord thy God for the good land which he hath given thee."

In former Thanksgiving sermons I have spoken of the corn and the wheat and the rye and the apples and the pears and the oranges and the grapes and cows and horses and the machinery and the manufactories and the homes and the stores and the railroads and the ships and the public buildings which have been produced during the year, but to-day I would dwell on the four great geographical developments which took place in our American history that have given us this great broad land for which we give thanks. I would dwell especially on the heroic men to whom, under the providence of God, we owe these vast regions of land rich in fruits and minerals. The land of those men in our schoolbooks days, but as we reach middle life their names become unfamiliar, and we forget their splendid achievements. They ought not so to be. Our gratitude as a nation is due, and we owe it to them that in our national thanksgiving their names are remembered.

I want to recall to your memories four momentous historic movements because their happy solution, happy in reference to our own national life, hung, as it were, upon the slenderest thread. The balances in every case trembled this way and that, as though undecided whether to go up or to go down. In at least three cases the sudden death of one man who was pivotal in international transactions would have changed the trend of all American history and would have made the continent a collection of many armed governments, and we should have seen the European monarchies jostle and push each other here as they do elsewhere in a mad struggle for live.

Let us first study the causes which led up to the famous treaty of Paris of 1763. In order to do this we must turn back the dial of Ahaz to the beginning of the Revolutionary war. And as we enter the town meetings of New England and afterward attend the sessions of the Continental congress we shall hear one sentiment echoed by one public document indicating that the thirteen colonies set any value in the land of the northwest or even of that land lying just beyond the Ohio river out of which the great states of Ohio and Indiana and Illinois and Michigan and Wisconsin have been carved. The thirteen colonies took no more interest in this region than Americans do to-day in Manchuria or Timbuktu. This region was to them the impenetrable wilderness which would never be inhabited. Thomas Jefferson himself once declared that we did not want any territory except that east of the Alleghany mountains. This region, he said, was capable of supporting a population of 800,000,000 people, and that was enough people for any government to control. The thirteen colonies not only did not care for this region, but they did not realize the danger of that region being in the hands of an alien and possibly an unfriendly government.

Their watchword was the work of one man. Out of the wilderness a man came who knew its value. He was a hunter and a dreamer, a man who had lived with the huge mountains and great rivers, who had rested under trees hundreds of years old, an athlete who used thousands upon thousands of square miles of land for a playground. George Rogers Clark is his name. He is one of the most influential factors in American history. He was one of the great private men whose love for the treaty of 1783 turned. He first came east in 1778 as a delegate from the modern state of Kentucky to the colonial assembly of Virginia, "with a petition that Kentucky should be incorporated into the colony of Virginia as a new county." I am now quoting the exact words of the historian Fletcher Johnson in reference to this petition.

After his mission was ended he returned home. While east he heard the story of the uprising against British rule. Then he commenced to brood as only a world's dreamer can brood. He saw in imagination not only the thirteen colonies winning their independence, but he also saw the vast territory extending from the Ohio to the Mississippi joined to the government about to be formed. Then in the darkest days of the Revolutionary uprising, in the winter of Valley Forge's horror, George Rogers Clark embarked in a sloop to Williamsburg, Va., and knocked at the office door of Governor Patrick Henry. "Come in," called Governor Patrick Henry. "What do you want?" he asked the strange western pedestrian. "I want," answered George Rogers Clark, "an army to go and capture the great northwest from the British." "I heard!" said Governor Henry. "We have no soldiers and no money." "Then," answered Clark, "I can have no soldiers or money I want letters of authority to organize the hunters of that region into an army, and I alone will do the rest." Governor Patrick Henry gave to this visionary farmer the letters he requested. To make a long story short, George Rogers Clark gathered together 90 men. They were a Gideon's band of intrepid heroes. With this little handful of followers he plunged into the forest and attacked the British at Kaskaskia. He then marched on, gathering up his army as he went, until at last he wrested Detroit from the grasp of the British Commander Henry Hamilton. Such is the history of the conquest of the great northwest. It was all due to the foresight of one brilliant dreamer, George Rogers Clark. I will find room for no more into detail. However, before we leave the forest tracks of this valiant American patriot I would call your attention to the influence the name of George Rogers Clark with that of a William Clark of the Clark and Lewis expedition to Oregon. They were two different men and of no relation, although they bore the same family name.

The scene changes. The war for American independence has successfully come to an end. We are now in the most beautiful capital of the world. This is London. We are not in the presence of the four American commissioners who had charge of the signing the treaty which would finally close the seven years' war. John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, John Jay and Henry Laurens are all there. Thomas Jefferson was also appointed a commissioner, but he never served on this commission. One of your instructions, ye American representatives? "Why," says John Jay, the most influential member of the commission, "congress has confused these instructions. It has sent us over to secure peace terms of peace. Then it has tied us hand and foot with these instructions. We are not to consult and hold any confidential communications upon all subjects to the ministers of our generous ally, France, and we are to undertake nothing in the negotiations for peace or treaty without their knowledge and concurrence, and we are to govern yourself by their advice and opinion." Did you ever hear such nonsensical instructions in your life?

But, Mr. Jay, why are you bitter at those instructions? Is not France our friend? Does she not wish to help us in every way? "No, emphatically no," answers John Jay. "France has been our friend. France joined us at Yorkton not because she loved us, but because she wanted to humiliate a national foe. France is not only opposed to our interests, but she wants all this land west of the Ohio river to be a buffer British control. Why, only the other day the Count d'Arandas suggested that the mississippi river ina northwest? "What right?" indignantly cries the great American diplomat. "By the right of conquest. Have you not read how George Rogers Clark led his troops through that region and conquered the British general at Detroit to surrender to him?" Well, Mr. Jay, what do you intend to do?" "Intend to thwart the selfish machinations of the French king. I shall first sign a treaty with the English commissioners without consulting the French ministers. Then I shall take that treaty to the French king's ministers and say: 'Sire, we must agree to be branded as our nation's enemies.' And this is what John Jay, the great American statesman, outlined the American commissioners to do. Thus we find that the great treaty of Paris of 1783 was practically the direct work of two great American heroes—George Rogers Clark, "the backwoods dreamer, and John Jay,— the astute diplomat, who dared to defy the direct orders of the French king and who dared to thwart the plans of the French minister Vergennes.

My friends, on this Thanksgiving Thanksgiving Sabbath let us think for a moment what our government would have been had not these two American heroes set forward the northwestern boundary from the Ohio river to the mouth of the Mississippi. Can you even think what this government would be if we had been compelled to erect warring fortresses from Buffalo and Pittsburg and Cincinnati and Louisville and Natchez and custom house officials had been set on the north the eastern shores of the Ohio to keep the goods of our western country from entering New York and Philadelphia duty free? Why, so important is this region which was ceded to the United States Government in 1783 that in the year 1890 Dr. Mowry declared it had 18,000,000 inhabitants. It had nearly one-third of all the railroad mileage of the United States. It produced a large part of our farm products, while its manufactories were simply unlimited. On this Thanksgiving day of 1900 we cannot too thank God for the treaty of Paris in 1783, which gave to us the middle west? Cannot you thank God for the foresight George Rogers Clark and for the clever diplomat John Jay, who dared to defy the instructions of his French government and compelled France to be just to her American allies?

We must close the discussion of this interesting Thanksgiving theme. The next great geographical expansion in which I shall refer to you as strange as the Louisiana purchase. The in direct cause of this purchase is almost unknown to the majority of American citizens. And in order to give the historical setting to this transaction I shall first introduce to you as strange and as weird a personality as George Rogers Clark. This man is not a white man, but a full blooded negro. He is not living in France or Spain or in the United States, but in the island of Santo Domingo. And yet this negro, this ex-slave, named Toussaint l'Ouverture, whom Napoleon betrayed by false promises and brutally starved to death in the French dungeon of St. [illegible]

SOME GOOD ADVICE TO READERS OF THE BEAVER.

A weak stomach and consequent indigestion are not considered by many people as serious matters, but of all diseases to which mankind is subject there is no other one which is more prolific in the production of misery and wretchedness. Dyspepsia is the very worst form of indigestion or stomach trouble and the symptoms are so numerous that it would require a large amount of space to describe them. Suffice it to say that you can eat anything you wish and have a good appetite, but after meals you have a feeling of distress, a sensation of fullness, a dizziness in the head, a feeling of drowsiness, a disinclination for either mental or physical exertion, a specking before the eyes, a fluttering of the heart, a weak back, kidneys irregular, a sallow complexion, cold hands and feet, a dragging down sensation in the stomach, a variable appetite, sometimes ravenous, sometimes fickle, a foul taste in the mouth, a coated tongue, and sometimes a thick, slimy substance raised from the stomach. Dyspepsia is the direct cause of many other diseases, such as Biliousness, Kidney Complaint, Nervousness, Sick Headache, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Blood Disorders, Female Complaints, Piles, Constipation, Catarrh, Consumption, Bronchitis, Throat Troubles, Lung Troubles, Asthma, Colds, Coughs, Sore Throat, Influenza, Pneumonia, Fevers, Eruptions, Boils, Pimples, Blackheads, Eczema, Scrofula, Blood Poisons, Ulcers, Abscesses, Tumors, Cancers, Erysipelas, Dropsy, Diabetes, Bright's Disease, Nervous Prostration, Nervous Debility, Insomnia, Hysteria, Epilepsy, Locomotor Ataxia, Paralysis, Spinal Troubles, Locomotor Ataxia, Paralysis, Spinal Troubles, Loss of Memory, Impotency, Sexual Weakness, Premature Decline, Effects of Abuse or Excesses, Mental Worry, Despondency, Sorrow, Gloom, Melancholy, Suicidal Tendencies, Insanity, Idiocy, Death.

Now, reader, if you are afflicted with any of the above symptoms or diseases, you should at once commence the use of Dr. Morse's Indian Root Pills, and write to the Dr. Morse Indian Root Pill Co., Kingston, Ont., for their free book, which tells all about the Pills and how to use them. Don't be a burden to yourself and friends when you can be cured so easily. Dr. Morse's Indian Root Pills are a positive cure for Dyspepsia and all diseases arising from it. They are a purely vegetable compound, and are perfectly harmless. They are a blessing to women, and are unsurpassed as a blood purifier. Dr. Morse's Indian Root Pills are sold by druggists at 25c. a box, or five boxes for $1.00, or will be sent by mail on receipt of price. Beware of imitations and substitutes. Refuse all pills said to be "just as good" as Dr. Morse's Indian Root Pills. They are the best blood purifier known to medical science. Don't be persuaded to buy anything else. Insist on getting Dr. Morse's Indian Root Pills, or send to the Dr. Morse Indian Root Pill Co., Kingston, Ont., for them. Don't delay writing for the free book, but do it to-day.

PHILIPPINE FORESTS.

Precious Woods That Go to Waste In Quantities.

The natural growth of the Philippine forests is computed by Major Ahern, chief of the insular forestry bureau, to be 1,400,000,000 cubic feet—three times the cut for 1900 in the entire United States. At the present time fully 90 per cent of the natural growth is going to waste, and the world is clamoring for the woods—the ebonies, mahoganies, ironwoods, construction woods, all manner of precious woods that need only modern methods, a maximum of machinery and a minimum of handling to realize Monte Cristos of the needed lumbermen.

There are many millions of cubic feet in the forests of the Philippines that would be cut in order properly thin out the dense growth. For instance, where there are three or four trees growing on a space required for one and there so freed would put on more good wood each year than the four together. The question as to whether 200 or 2000 trees should remain on an acre is where the real value of scientific forestry is shown. Then, too, there are many more millions of feet which reach maturity and pass on to decay, never thrilling to the woodman's ax. There are, however, very few companies in the Philippines properly equipped to handle large logs, and without master mechanics, expert gangbosses—in fact, all the skilled labor required—and a reasonably full stock of the best supply material it would be hazardous to move the large logs which must be cut and brought to market if the profits are to be properly exploited. A good price is paid in Hongkong for every stick of timber from the Philippines, and the American lumber men with modern methods can solve the problem, and in so doing they will not only help to educate the adaptable Filipino as to practical things, but will insure him cash wages, something unusual in Spanish days.—Hamilton Wright in The World Today.

Danced the Ship to Safety.

Aided by the cadence of several hundred lusty sailors dancing a sailor's jig to the music of the ship's band, H. M. battleship Dominion backed off the obstruction on which she had grounded in the bay De Chaleur. The Dominion was proceeding from Charlottetown, P. E. I., to Quebec when during the night she struck hard aground. Realizing that the ship's crew was ordered on deck, the Dominion's band was commanded to play a jig, and all hands, sailors with his heavy dunnage bag in his hands, danced in time to the music, while the engineers put on full steam astern. Gradually the force of the engines, aided by the oscillation caused by the movement of hundreds of feet in unison, drew the big ship backward until she floated safely in deep water.

TRY THIS FOR YOUR COUGH

To relieve a rough or break up a cold in twenty-four hours, one fellow-citizen gives formula, two ingredients of which can be obtained at any drug store, the druggist at small cost; in all that will be required. Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure), one ounce. Glycerine, two ounces; good Whisky, two ounces. Mix and take in teaspoonful doses every four hours. The dealers state that the Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure) obtained of them is the purest and strongest it is possible to purchase. Be sure and get the ingredients separately and prepare the mixture yourself. Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure) should be purchased in the original full ounce vials, which druggists buy for dispensing. Each vial is encircled by a round wooden case which protects the Oil from exposure to light. Around this wooden case is also engraved wrapper with the name—Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure)—plainly printed thereon. There are many imitations and cheap productions of Pine, but Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure) is the only one that will produce results. 40m

Future of Wireless.

May I be allowed to sum up one or two considerations as to the probable influence of wireless telegraphy on the future of our race? In the first place, a severance of communication with any part of the earth, even the antipodes, will henceforth be impossible. Storms that overthrow telegraph posts and malice that cuts our cables are impotent in the all pervading ether. An explorer like Stanley in the tropical forest or Peary amid ice fields will report daily progress in the Times. Every wandering tramp steamer will have its wireless set, and will be in constant touch with vessels that dot the ocean all about it. Sir William Preece's discovery of signaling to Europe by utilizing Niagara for the experiment—yet to be realized.—Nineteenth Century.

New Incandescent Lamps.

During the past year the new electric lamps, with filaments of tantalum, osmium or zirconium instead of carbon, have been widely tested with most promising results. Many of these lamps are now in use in Europe. Still it is felt that the best possible results have not yet been obtained, and inventors continue to seek improvements. In the hope of developing a plan the Revue Generale des Sciences, only a hundredth part of the electric energy expended is utilized in luminous radiations. In consequence the luminous efficiency is rapidly augmented with increase of temperature, almost as the fifth power of the temperature, the latest effort is directed to the end of securing the greatest possible elevation of the temperature of the filaments.

A Wonderful Fruit.

A wonderful fruit has been found in the neighborhood of the coast of the gulf of California. It is said to have the power, says a report, to "change the flavor of the most acid substance into a delicious sweetness." An official has found it to grow in a wild state in Sonora nine and adds that "if a lemon be sucked within two or three hours of eating one of the fruits the acid flavor is entirely counteracted." The fruit resembles a small plum, with the seed invested in a thin, soft pulp, wherein lies the peculiar sweetening property.

Observer Adopts New Spelling.

The New York Observer, one of the oldest religious publications in the country, is one of the first of its class to join the ranks of the simpler spellers. In the youth's department all of the changes suggested by the simplified spelling board have been adopted. In the rest of the paper a more conservative policy will be followed, 200 of the 300 words recommended being used in the new form.

Have You Injured Your Skin

A North-West farmer died recently from blood poisoning, the result of a prick of a rusty nail. A tin tack on which he had penetrated a Chicago boot, and he died later from lockjaw. Both of these deaths could have been averted if a box of Zam-Buk had been handy. Zam-Buk is full of potent-germ - destroying properties, and when applied these harmful germs are killed and the wound is healed.

One of the greatest living chemists has proved that Zam-Buk has more power to kill harmful microbes in wounds than even carbolic acid, and it does it painlessly. A little Zam-Buk applied to a cut, a sore, a burn, or a bruise which breaks the skin, prevents further germ growth, checks the wrong turn, and speedily heals it.

Mrs. Bright, of Johnstone, N.B., says:—"I get my finger poisoned by a piece of wire, and as I got badly bad I applied some old-fashioned remedies, but continued to get worse, and I then tried Zam-Buk. This soon cleaned the wound and healed it, and not a trace of the injury was gone."

In cases of old sores, Zam-Buk is the best ever discovered. Mrs. Hall, of Upper Canard, Kings Co., N.S., writes:—"I had a terrible sore, ringworm, eczema, abscesses, and other skin troubles. All kinds of ointments, salves, etc., failed to cure me, but Zam-Buk has done it completely. And I am glad to say I am entirely free from them." Zam-Buk is for sale at all druggists and stores, or post free from Zam-Buk Co., Toronto, upon receipt of price, 50 cents per box, or 2 boxes for $2.50.

Bileans a "Woman's Medicine."

GRATEFUL WIVES AND MOTHERS TESTIFY TO THEIR VALUE.

Bileans have been called "a woman's medicine" because of their exceptional fitness for the various ailments peculiar to the female sex. Bileans are a positive cure for irregularities and painful periods. Unlike most "female" remedies, Bileans contain no blemish, mercury or any mineral whatever. They are purely vegetable.

Mrs. J. Whitfield, of Swan Lake, Man., says,—"Bileans have done me a great deal of good. For years I was hardly describe how bad I felt before I used them. I would get so nervous that I caused pain. There was a constant dull pain on right side, and after a while my liver was entirely out of order. I could not sleep at night, and was troubled from kidney trouble, and was altogether in a miserable condition. I had been ailing in this way for years, and was almost given up to die when I had become very ill and discouraged.

"Bileans are absolutely unequalled for female ailments and irregularities, constipation, piles, anaemia, debility, rheumatism, blood disorders, etc. They tone up the system and enable it to throw off robs and disease together. Bileans are emerging into health and strength to these who are rundown. Of all druggists at 50c. a box, or post free from The Bilean Co., Toronto, on receipt of price. 6 boxes for $2.50.

LITTLE CREEK.

We are glad to know Rob. Down is able to attend church again.

Ploughing is now a thing of the past.

Mr. Wm. Baird is on the sick list.

Mr. Irvine Hardy is home to escape one evening last week. He left from the top of his head, remaining unconscious for some time, forcibly reminding him of his accident.

The school is progressing favorably under the skilful management of Miss Reid.

Mr. and Mrs. G. J. Down gave an at home in behalf of their Little Creek friends and Hawley friends one evening recently. The time was spent in choice music and social games. All report a pleasant time.

Our cheese factory is still running, and Mrs. E. Miller have moved on their farm again.

MORVEN.

The funeral of the late Mrs. William Gilchrist was held at their residence on Sunday afternoon. The deceased was taken suddenly ill on Thursday, and died on Friday morning last. She leaves besides a husband, a son and two daughters to mourn her loss. She was a quiet and respected lady, and will be greatly missed among her many friends. Deepest sympathy is extended to the friends.

A number from here attended the re-opening services at Napanee Western Methodist church on Sunday last.

Miss M. McPherson is spending a few weeks at E. M. Smith's.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Clute, Toorpe, spent Sunday under the parental roof.

Morven was quite deserted on Monday evening, a large number attending the tesmeeting at Violet. They report a splendid time.

Great preparations are being made for our Xmas tree. Particulars later.

Mr. and Miss Steacy, of Napanee, Mr. Brasco, of Hawley, Miss F. Schryver, of Chambers, and Mr. and Mrs. Detlor, of Hawley, spent Sunday at J. P. Miller's.

Mr. Fred. Wales, of Switzerville, spent Sunday at Mr. B. Lund's.

ABRAM WINTERS,
Tp. Clerk.

A LENNOX OLD BOY.

We know of no person from Lennox who has risen to more prominence in his calling than Mr. H. F. Timmerman of Odessa, who is steadily advancing up the top of the latter. The Toronto World, Saturday last, says:

The World was informed yesterday that one of the biggest shuffles among the general and district superintendents of the C.P.R. is shortly to take place.

The most important change is that of H. P. Timmerman, general superintendent of the Ontario division, who will change places with Mr. Campbell, general superintendent of the Montreal division. Mr. Timmerman's promotion will place him next to the assistant general manager.

It is understood that H. P. Timmerman's going to Montreal as general superintendent will only be a prelude to a higher appointment. H. P. Timmerman is a son-in-law of Dr. Drinkwater, assistant to Sir Thos. Shaughnessy.

The Beaver and a host of friends extend congratulations to Mr. Timmerman.

CHAMBERS.

Quite a few from here attended the sale of Mr. Claspert's on Monday afternoon.

Farmers are busy in this vicinity, taking advantage of the beautiful weather to be ready for snow when it comes.

Mrs. Lyd's Schermerhorn, of Selby, has been visiting her niece, Mrs. J. Bedell.

Misses Ina and Ila Scrimshaw entertained a number of their schoolmate's on Saturday afternoon.

Mrs. John Smith is visiting her daughter, Mrs. B. Lucas, Belleville.

Miss B. A. Gould is visiting her grandmother, Mrs. Levi Gould, Lonsdale.

Miss Lily Abbott was the guest of her cousin, Miss Mina Schell, for a few days last week.

Messrs. Will and Willis Schell returned from their hunting expedition, and as usual enjoyed the trip very much.

Miss Freda Garrison, Morven, was the guest of her friend, Miss Hazel Cummings, on Sunday.

Miss Maggie Detlor

"A MESSAGE FROM MARS."

Some stage offerings die the first year. Others last two years, but it is not frequently that they are presented to the public for a period longer than three years. They are regarded as plays of unusual strength. "A Message from Mars," which will be presented at the Grand Opera House in Kingston, on Monday, Dec. 3d, has a record of three consecutive years in London, two consecutive years in the City of New York, three years in the larger cities of the United States, making a total of eight years. This, in brief, tells the story of the splendid merit of this comedy. It was seen there two years ago when everybody liked it.

NAPANEE POULTRY SHOW.

The Napanee Poultry, Pigeon and Pet Stock Association expect their winter show, Jan. 9th to 12th, to be much larger than that of last year. Enquiries are coming in daily from all over the province for prize list and entry forms, and prospects are the show will exceed that of last year by several hundred entries. Many silver and bronze medals, cash specials, silver cups, club ribbons, besides the large list of regular prizes are being offered. Mr. L. G. Jarvis, Montreal, who gave such excellent satisfaction last year, will judge, and the public will have opportunity of seeing prize fowl from all parts of Ontario.

CROUP.

CHURCH RE-OPENING.

The officials of the Western Methodist church have expended between two and three thousand dollars in beautifying and making more comfortable their church, which is now most attractive and commodious. The floor from near the pulpit to the front of the church has been raised, circular seats, made at Wakerville, have replaced the old ones; the auditorium has been carpeted with a beautiful green carpet; the wood-work in the front of the gallery has been removed and replaced with brass rods and plush; the walls have been re-calcimined. The re-opening services were held last Sunday when Rev. D. O. Crosley preached two earnest, practical sermons to the delight of very large congregations. The choir ably assisted by Miss Elsie Price, of Bellesville, and Mr. McGillivary, of Hespler, did much in making the services helpful and inspiring. The collections and subscriptions amounted to more than $2,000.

The lecture as announced for Monday night had to be postponed on account of the rain.

Bazaar and Supper.

The Ladies' Aid of the Presbyterian church will hold a bazaar in the Town Hall next Wednesday, opening at 2 o'clock. This will be a grand opportunity to obtain nice Xmas presents very cheaply, as few articles will be over 25c in price. A good supper will be served in the evening from 5.30 to 7.30 o'clock, when the tables will then be cleared away and a fine entertainment will be given, beginning at 8 o'clock. The programme is under the management of Mrs. Dr. Sills and Mrs. J. G. Daly, which ensures a first class one. Admission to supper, 25 cts., and 10 cents additional for the concert.

The young ladies of the congregation will have a booth, where they will sell beautifully dressed dolls for Santa Claus, and all kinds of home made candy. Tea will also be served all afternoon in the Japanese tea room by ladies dressed in Japanese costumes. A cordial invitation is extended to the general public.

FRATERNAL RESOLUTION.

Z. A. Vanluven,—

Dear Brother,—The members of our Hesta Circle, having learned with deep regret of the sad bereavement which has overtaken you, in the death of your devoted and beloved wife, unite in conveying to you an expression of heartfelt sympathy in this your trying hour of great sorrow and the irreparable loss of one who was the trusted partner and companion of your joys and sorrows.

As loyal and loving members of a Fraternal band, we do indeed share your grief, and we too will keenly feel the loss of her kind counsel and sisterly help in our Circle meetings, but knowing how little human sympathy can do to mitigate our sufferings when affliction or bereavement overtake us, till death comes to part the ties which bind the family circle, we commend you to our Heavenly Father, who at no ever present help in time of need, and may He comfort you and lead you to Him and a reunion in that circle which surrounds the throne, with those who have gone before.

Fraternally yours in C. H. and U., on behalf of Circle 196

A full representation of the executive from each polling sub-division is requested. 48b

PRESENTATION.

About twenty-five members of St. Joan's Church, Selby, went to the home of Miss Gladys Carscallen, the organist of the church, and presented her with an address and a purse of money as a token of their appreciation of her faithful services. The address was read by Mr. Herbert Wilkins, and purse presented by Miss Jennie Wallace. The Rev. T. Donnell made a short speech, expressing his thanks to Miss Carscallen, for her great assistance to him in conducting the services, and also to those who had so generously contributed towards the gift which had just been presented. A pleasant social time was spent and refreshments served, and everyone went away having had a splendid time.

COPELAND—CONNERS.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Thos. E. McGirr, Centreville, was the scene of a very pretty event on Wednesday evening, Nov. 21st, when Miss Ella Copeland, Centreville, was united in marriage to Mr. George M. Conners, a prominent young farmer of Camden Delta. The marriage was solemnized by the Rev. R. Allen, methodist pastor of this place, in the presence of a few of the immediate relatives and friends. The bride looked very becoming in a navy blue Duchess cloth dress and white embroidered chiffon trimmings and carried a bouquet of white chrysanthemums, and was assisted by Miss Jennie Long, who looked very pretty dressed in a white taffeta silk skirt and white silk blouse, who also carried a bouquet of white chrysanthemums. The groom was ably supported by Mr. Frank Carscallen, of Desmond. After the ceremony, which was performed at the hour of 7 o'clock sharp, all adjourned to the dining room, where a dainty tea had been prepared for the guests. Congratulations are extended to Mr. and Mrs. Conners for a happy and prosperous future. The presents were numerous and costly.

away and hitting herself from pursuit.

"Speak, speak, dear Laura. Is this really so? Are you sure of it?" exclaimed Rose, excitedly.

"I believe it, though, perhaps, there may be a difficulty in proving it."

"Tell me what you know."

Laura related the history of her acquaintance with Ruth Russel, and described the interview with the landlady upon the evening when Robert Thugsen unexpectedly returned to the house.

"And the woman—where is she now?" cried Rose, excitedly.

"She disappeared with her children, the next morning, and has not since been heard of. The man actually threw himself in the way of the warrant I had got issued for his arrest—'to have the farce over,' as he said to the magistrate."

"But the woman?" persisted Rose.

"Has passed entirely out of sight. But you must tell the duke what I have told you, and the woman must be found, and the fact of her marriage proved."

They conversed some time longer upon the exclaircissement of the evening, and then Rose, whose eyes were affectionately watching her friend, said:

"Laura, can you not sleep now?"

"I think I shall never sleep again in this world, dearest."

"Oh, then I must make you sleep—that is all!"

And so saying, Rose summoned the landlady and dispatched her to the nearest chemist to procure an opiate. While Mrs. Brown was gone, Rose, with her own hands, undressed Laura and made her go to bed. And when the landlady returned she administered the morphine, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing the wearied woman in a sound sleep.

Rose drew an armchair to the bedside, and, dressed as she was, seated herself in it, to a rest that was half watchfulness.

Several times during the night Laura started and shuddered throughout her frame, as though the consciousness of misery pursued her even in her dreams. But toward morning she sank into a profound rest and lay as one dead for many hours.

At six o'clock Rose softly left her seat, extinguished the night-light, and opened the window, to let in the room. And Laura still slept the deep, deep sleep of exhaustion.

By the time Rose had arranged her toilet, set the room in order, and resumed her seat by the bedside, Laura awoke with a start, looked around with a bewildered air, and exclaimed:

"Was it a dream? Then, suddenly falling and covering her face with her hands, she groaned in the full memory of all her woe.

Rose went and stood silently beside her for a few moments, and then ventured to steal up and press a kiss upon her cold hands.

Laura immediately removed them from her face and asked, wildly:

"What is the hour, dear Rose?"

"It is just seven, Laura."

"Just seven. And in seven, to-morrow—— Oh, God! he has but twenty-four hours to live, Rose!"

"He has all mercy to live! Try to think of his immortality," said the young duchess, stooping and kissing her friend.

Then, leaving Laura to collect herself, she went and ordered breakfast.

When she returned, she waited on Laura with all the tenderness of a sister, bathing her face, combing her hair, dressing her with care, making her partake of the tea and toast, when it was brought, and, finally, ordered a cab to convey her to Newgate.

When the cab was summoned, Rose put on her own bonnet and mantle, saying:

"You must let me accompany you to the prison, dear Laura. I will not intrude. I will remain outside in the cab until I hear whether Mr. Cassinove is willing to see me. If he is, I will visit the cell for a few minutes; if not, I will return here and await your arrival."

"Dear Rose, the prison is not a proper place for you to visit. You must stepped very far down, if your sphere to come to see me."

"And my place is proper for me to visit where my duty calls me. So say no more, dear Laura, for I will attend you."

Too despairing to contend, Laura yielded; and they went downstairs together and entered the cab. It was but a short drive to Newgate.

When they reached the prison, Laura left the young duchess in the cab, and entered alone. An officer in attendance conducted her at once to the condemned cell. When the door was opened, she saw Dr. Clark and the Rev. Mr. Watson sitting on the side of the cot, and talking to Cassinove, who was seated upon a stool.

Cassinove immediately arose, and seated his wife in the only chair.

The physician and clergyman stood up and greeted her with grave sympathy. And then, saying that they would return again in the course of the forenoon, retired, and left the unhappy pair together.

Both were more composed than they had been on the evening before. They had need to be calm, for what a day was before them!

The last day of Cassinove's life swiftly passing away.

After they had clasped each other's hands, and looked wistfully into each other's eyes and had asked and answered questions as to how each had passed the night, and Laura had told of the kindness of the young duchess, she added:

"Rose is waiting in the cab outside. She wishes to see you, if you have no objection."

"Certainly not, love; go, bring her at once, that I may thank her for her angelic goodness to you," said Cassinove.

Laura went to bring Rose. As the young duchess entered the prison, the gloomy officer, who had ushered Laura to the cell, looked at her with admiration, and, as she was ushered into the cell, whispered to the officer who followed:

"Is she not an angel?"

"She is indeed, madam; but for the thought of my wife, I would get discontent," said Cassinove, bitterly.

"Mr. Cassinove, Laura is to me like a dear sister, and more than a sister, for I love her more than any one in the world except one."

"You are the angel of her life, as she is of mine," said the prisoner.

"Mr. Cassinove, if my position and hers were reversed, if I were in the same straits to which she is now reduced, I would throw myself upon her noble heart for sympathy, and feel sure of finding it. What I know Laura is such a one, I am sure, and I wish to be to her," said Rose, earnestly.

"I am sure that you will be all that the kindest friend can be to my bereaved wife," replied the young man, gratefully.

"Yes, Mr. Cassinove, and after—after—when——"

The words seemed to suffocate her, for she could proceed no further.

"When all is over with me," suggested the prisoner, in a gentle voice.

"When you are with God," said Rose, in a firmer tone, "then I would pray Laura to return with me to Bereseligh House, and share my heart and home forever."

Cassinove looked with reverential admiration upon her eloquent young face, but answered nothing as yet.

She continued:

"I fear it will be thought too presumptuous in me to ask such a thing of Laura; I should scarcely venture so much if I did not know that her greatest desire will be found in doing good, and that her presence will be a great good to me."

"And—the duke, madam?"

"My husband understands the great blessing that Laura would be to me, and for that reason, as well as for the high esteem he has for her, he warmly approves the plan. He authorises all that I have said, and more."

The doomed man looked from the earnest, feminine countenance of the young duchess to the beautiful, pale face of his wife, and hesitated. Rose, seeing his embarrassment, hastened to say:

"Oh, Mr. Cassinove, I am already spoken to Laura. Do you also speak to her; she will not gainsay you. Persuade her to consent to share my home, and I shall feel that I have confidence to my heart. To me and to my husband she shall be as the dearest of our sisters."

"Ah, your sisters, madam—how should they receive my unhappy one?" inquired Cassinove, turning a look of unutterable love and compassion upon his wife.

"With the warmest welcome, with the most respectful sympathy. All will study her comfort; from my noble mother-in-law down to me. We are a united family, Mr. Cassinove. We think with one mind, and feel with one heart. Oh, believe it."

"Alas, madam, I have but words, and words are all too poor and vain to express how profoundly I feel your goodness."

"You approve my plan, and you will persuade Laura to agree to it?"

"My wife will require no persuasion to become your guest for a few weeks, and I shall be tranquilized to think that in the first days of her grief she will be in a safe haven among dear friends."

"Laura, you hear?" exclaimed Rose, turning to her friend.

"Yes, I hear, sweet Rose," replied the pale woman. Then, turning to her husband, she asked, "Is this your will, dear Cassinove? Shall you be happier to have me so disposed of?"

"Yes, love, yes; it were ungracious and ungrateful to refuse so kind an offer. You will go to the Duchess of Bereseligh for a few weeks, until you have recovered the shock of this calamity. Afterward, Providence will provide."

"She will never have the heart to leave me, I will love her so well," said Rose, rising, and gravely embracing Laura. Then looking at Cassinove, she said, "This is settled."

"It is settled," answered the prisoner, and his wife in the same breath.

There was a pause, and then a sudden paleness overspread the face of Rose. She knew that she must not now or intrude upon the last hours of the condemned man and his devoted wife, but she felt all the pain of bidding a last farewell to a man doomed to die a violent death in a few hours.

For an instant she hesitated and acute realisation of all this overwhelmed her, the scene darkened before her eyes, the floor seemed to sink under her feet.

"Oh, I must not faint! I must not on no account, who am required to support others," was the thought that called back her ebbing strength. She went up to Cassinove and offered him both hands, saying:

"Mr. Cassinove, I need not tell you that I believe fully in your innocence; you know that I do. May the Almighty and All-Merciful be your support and your! When I am out of your sight, I shall be on my knees in prayer for you. Good-by."

"Farewell, blessed angel! May the richest blessings of Heaven descend on you and yours," said Cassinove, with deep emotion.

Rose turned to the prisoner's wife, saying:

"I shall come for you, Laura, at the hour of closing. Good-by for the present."

Laura rose to accompany her back to the hackney-coach, but outside the cell she met Dr. Clark, and consigned Rose to his care.

Meanwhile, Laura remained in the cell with her husband until the return of Dr. Clark and Mr. Watson, when she retired to let them speak unreservedly to Cassinove, while she herself went to seek an interview with the warden of the prison. On entering his office, she sat down, and, in a hesitating manner, preferred her mournful request to be permitted to remain with her husband on the last night of his life; but she was kindly, though firmly, informed that the rules would not allow her to do so.

Laura saw that entreaties and prayers would be of no avail to break these stern rules, and, in pale despair, she arose and left the office.

Laura re-entered Cassinove's cell, she was surprised to observe that Mr. Watson was no longer there, but that an unexpected visitor, Colonel Hastings, was seated beside Cassinove, whose suddenly blanched face and tearful eyes betrayed the fact that he had received some unexpected intelligence that even in this day of doom had power to transfix him. Both the prisoner and the visitor were so deeply absorbed that they, neither of them, observed the entrance of Laura, who sank unnoticed into her chair. Colonel Hastings was saying:

"After the sudden death of my son, I hastened from Baden-Baden to do you all the justice, I found you on trial for life, and had no opportunity of communicating with you. I placed myself among the witnesses for your defense, and awaited the issue of the trial. After your conviction, I saw that there was no time to be lost, if I meant to obtain the clemency of the Crown. I sought the minister immediately, and found the Duke of Bereseligh with him on the same errand of friendship, but with the view of obtaining his favor. This morning I obtained an audience with the King, and having preferred my petition, was bluntly refused and dismissed. I next sought an interview with the Queen, and implored her intercession, but in vain, for neither pardon, commutation nor respite could I get. In despair I returned home, and thought that I would let the matter drop, as the revelation at such a crisis would avail nothing. But then an irresistible desire to confess everything, and obtain your forgiveness, brought me hither."

"It is very, very bitter—say nothing to her of this until it is all over; to know it now would only increase her distress; whereas the knowledge a few days hence might have a beneficial effect upon her spirits. Now, if you please, Colonel Hastings, bring me those documents of which we spoke, and an able lawyer at once; I have but little time to attend to some necessary forms; the rest must be left to your management."

"If I live I will do all I can toward making restitution," said the colonel, turning to leave the cell, and seeing for the first time that the wife of the prisoner had entered.

"Colonel Hastings, Lady—I should say, Mrs. Cassinove. You see here one dying man come to ask pardon of another," said the colonel, solemnly, as he bowed and left the cell.

And indeed his very decrepit appearance seemed to warrant his grave words.

As soon as he was gone, Laura spoke:

"I must not deceive you, Cassinove. I have been here some minutes, and I overheard the conclusion of your interview with Colonel Hastings."

"And you have learned——"

"Nothing, but that something has been concealed from me."

"Only for a few days, dear one, then you shall know all. And then—you will try to bear up and live for my sake?"

"I will endeavor to do so, if unendurable affection, and save him her hand.

They were soon interrupted by the return of Colonel Hastings with a lawyer.

"Retire for a little while, dearest. I must see the gentlemen alone," said Cassinove.

And Laura left the cell, and took her seat upon a bench in the passage outside. She looked up and saw one of the officers of the prison approaching. She asked him what o'clock it was.

"Gone three."

"Gone three!" and she must leave him forever at six. Only three hours left, and those men taking up the precious time!

While she sat there with her life-powers ebbing away, Dr. Clark and Mr. Watson came up. The worthy physician and the good pastor had been in attendance upon Cassinove the greater part of the day. They looked surprised to see Laura sitting outside; but she explained to them that her husband was engaged with his lawyer.

The clergyman sat down beside her. Dr. Clark took her hand, and looked into her face, and then hurriedly walked away. He returned in a few minutes with a glass of wine and a biscuit, of which he forced Laura to partake.

At that moment, also, the cell door opened, and Colonel Hastings and the lawyer came out. They bowed in passing, and immediately left the prison.

Then the now past four o'clock; in two hours more Laura must bid her husband a final adieu. She re-entered the cell, accompanied by her two old friends, to pass those two precious, awful hours in his company. They found Cassinove grave and collected. He greeted his friends calmly, and then drew Laura to his side, and sat with her hand clasped in his. Oh, the clasp of that loved hand, so soon to be convulsed in a violent death! Oh, the glance of those loving eyes, so soon to be closed forever! The thought was suffocating, maddening to her. All the agony of the last few dreadful days had failed to prepare her for this hour of supreme agony. She felt that such an oath or insanity threatened her that heart or brain must instantly give way. She breathed a silent, agonising prayer, for help and strength. Mr. Watson noticed her increasing agony, and, taking the efficacy of Divine consolation in such extreme cases, he proposed that all should kneel and unite in invoking it. They knelt, and the venerable clergyman poured forth his soul in earnest prayer for the doomed prisoner, and for his most afflicted wife.

They arose from their knees strengthened to endure. And thought by degrees still reeled, and her heart still bled, Laura felt that she could now retain life and reason through the awful night of the hour.

Mr. Watson signed to Dr. Clark, and said:

"Cassinove, we will leave you together until the hour of closing, and then we shall return—to pass the night with you, and the doctor to receive your last farewell, dear friends; continue to call on 'Him who sounded the depths of human woe' to be your stay and support. Remember that this parting is but for a little time. Life at longest is but a span; and your re-union here-after will be better land, will be for all eternity."

And so saying the good pastor pressed the hands of Laura and Cassinove, and beckoned Dr. Clark to follow him from the cell.

"They have little more than half an hour; let them pass it together," said Mr. Watson.

Nor will we, reader, intrude upon a grief so sacred. We will remain with the clergyman and the physician in the passage, where they passed the sad interval in pacing up and down before the closed door of the cell, until an officer of the prison advanced and told them that the lady who had been there in the morning had returned in her carriage, and was waiting to speak with Mr. Cassinove.

Dr. Clark went immediately to request Rose and conduct her to the door of the cell.

The pallid face and dilated eyes of the young lady betrayed the sympathetic sufferings that she would willingly have concealed.

"Can you bear this, madam?" anxiously inquired Dr. Clark.

"Yes, yes; my duty is, so shall my strength be.' Is it not so, Mr. Watson?"

"Yes, dear madam, so may you prove it," replied the minister.

She needed all her strength now, for the great crisis of suffering had arrived.

The governor of the prison came up, saying:

"It is six o'clock, Mr. Watson. Will you be so good as to go to the prisoner and tell him so, and bring his unhappy wife. It seems a cruel thing to part them to-night, but in such cases from rule is the most merciful."

Mr. Watson bowed, and slowly and sadly entered the cell.

Cassinove and his devoted wife were standing together, his arm supporting her form, her head resting upon his breast.

"Is it time?" he inquired.

"It is time," replied the minister.

"The hour has come, love," said Cassinove, stooping and whispering to his wife.

She raised her head, and fixed her eyes upon his face with a long, long look. Then she threw her arms round him again, and clasped him to her heart with the strength of despair, as though her fragile frame would have held him away from the whirlpool of fate that was drawing him from her. She mutinatible desire to confess everything, and obtain your forgiveness, brought me hither."

"Good-by, my love—I go, even now? God bless you, love! Farewell! farewell!"

"God be with you, my own true wife! Farewell!" said Cassinove, gently disengaging her arms from about his neck and giving her to the charge of Mr. Watson.

The good minister supported her from the cell. She was white, cold and sinking; her life seemed ebbing fast away. But the governor of the prison, Dr. Clark had provided for this emergency. They sat her down upon the bench, before the young duchess, who tenderly supported her fainting form, while the doctor bathed her face in spirits of camphor.

Then, after a few minutes, supported on one side by Dr. Clark, and on the other by Mr. Watson, and attended by Rose, she was taken to the carriage. Rose got in first that she might receive Laura, as she was placed, more dead than alive, in the carriage. Rose received Laura in her arms, and supported her on her bosom, and the order was given to drive to Bereseligh House. The last sad scene of that ride. Rose could not mock that awful sorrow with any commonplaces of consolation.

When they reached the Bereseligh House they found Dr. Clark awaiting them. He had preceded them in a hackney coach and preceded them, to attend upon Mrs. Cassinove, whose sufferings, Rose foresaw, would require his utmost medical skill.

Laura was lifted immediately from the carriage, and conveyed by Dr. Clark to the sumptuous chamber prepared for her, where she lay insensible to all that was passing around her, looking more like the dead than the living.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Laura had not spoken since she had been brought to Bereseligh House. All night long she lay senseless and seemingly without life. Dr. Clark and Rose watched beside her till long after the sun had risen.

At length the doctor arose, and coming around to the side of the duchess, said:

"Your grace must retire to rest now, my dear madam. The last earthly troubles of Ferdinand Cassinove are over."

Rose looked up in wild affright.

"It is past eight o'clock; he died, you know, at seven."

Rose was indistinctly suppressed a shriek, although the news gave her inexplicable relief, for she thought:

"His soul is no longer agonised on earth; it is at peace with God."

"You will do well to retire to rest at once, I expect Mr. Watson here very soon. He promised, you know, to remain with Cassinove until all should be over, and then to come and bring his last words to his wife."

"Then I will stay till he comes, and I see my dear friend Laura awake, it," said Rose, resolutely.

Laura's condition seemed to change; from time to time she partially opened her eyes, and moaned as one in intolerable pain. At last she spoke:

"Oh, the long, long night—the long, long night—how does he bear it?"

At this moment there came a gentle knock at the chamber door. Mrs. Maberly went to open it. A servant appeared, who delivered a message, and retired. Mrs. Maberly came back to the doctor, and in her turn whispered:

"Mr. Watson, if you please, sir, is downstairs in the library waiting to see you."

The doctor nodded, and then looked anxiously at Laura. She seemed to have sunk back into apathy. He felt her pulse, and then, with a sad shake of the head, laid the pale, attenuated hand down upon the bed, and arose and glided from the room.

He went softly down the stairs and opened the library door.

The minister advanced to meet him; they shook hands in silence, and then the doctor said:

"You have come to tell us that it is finished."

"No—look there," replied the clergyman, as he stood there in his black clerical garb, and pointed to the gentleman who stood at the window with his back toward them.

The doctor turned around, and when the doctor raised his eyes, he stood face to face with——

"Ferdinand Cassinove!"

Yes, with Ferdinand Cassinove, who, holding out his hand exclaimed, in a joyful voice:

"My wife! how is she, doctor?"

"Great Heaven of heavens! Cassinove!" exclaimed the astonished the doctor, beside himself with astonishment.

Pardoned, fully and entirely pardoned, for—a crime that he never committed," replied the clergyman, gravely.

The doctor turned and met Cassinove's dark eyes, and grasped his hands in speechless joy, then presently found expression in a burst of manly tears.

"But how is this? What moved the minister. Tell me all about it?"

"What moved the minister was the attested confession of the wretch who really did commit the crime, and who has now gone to answer for it. Cassinove, the guiltless victim of circumstantial evidence, was to have suffered at seven o'clock this morning. At seven o'clock this morning Cassinove was free, and Thugsen, the threefold murderer, was in the hangman's hands!"

"For Heaven's sake, how was that?" inquired the greatly agitated doctor.

"I will tell you briefly. The attested dying confession of Thugsen was in the hands of the minister last night; but the unfortunate gentleman, Cassinove might have been free last night, and we all have been saved twelve hours of anguish. The pardon was placed in the hands of the sheriff at six o'clock this morning. An hour later and a legal murder had been committed. There, that is all I can tell you now, for I see that Cassinove is anxious that his wife should be comforted."

"My wife! how did she pass the trying night? How is she this morning?" inquired Cassinove.

"She passed the night in patient, silent anguish; this morning she may scarcely be said to live. But do not be alarmed, my man! I shall presently carry to her will bring her back life. Yes, Cassinove, this is my profession, and I tell you that I did this morning, she would not have survived until this hour."

"Oh, good friend, will you not go to her immediately, and break this news to her, and prepare her to see me?" said Cassinove, turning anxiously to Mr. Watson.

"Patience, my young friend; I must consult her physician first. Will it not be dangerous to communicate this intelligence in her present exhausted state, doctor?"

"No; I certainly think not; it is just the sort of shock she requires to bring her back from the borders of the grave."

"But the dangerous effects of sudden joy?"

"Circumstances alter cases. The sudden joy that would kill a person in the full possession of their health and strength, may only electrify a poor creature life one dying of grief. It is the principle of the antidote, sir—the principle of the antidote. So come with me, if you please, Mr. Watson, to Mrs. Cassinove's bedside. Come, Cassinove," said the good doctor, leading the way upstairs.

When they had reached the chamber door, the doctor paused, and said:

"We must use caution in applying this electric shock, however. You two had better remain outside a few moments, until I go and prepare her."

So off went the doctor, and awaking of Laura from her stupor, and agonized joy of meeting with her husband. As soon as she had sufficiently recovered her self-possession, Cassinove, with his form dilated with pride, and his eyes beaming with love, related how that he was again the Baroness of Etheridge, and that the title came through the death of his cousin Lord Colonel Hastings had communicated to him. He was no longer Ferdinand Cassinove, the Etheridge, the son of the late baron and Mary Coke, the beautiful daughter of his gamekeeper, but he was himself before——"

"Oh, no I am! I had rather gratulate that my mother's estates must descend to me. I had taken it for granted that as the inheritance came to me as a whole, it must go from me undivided. Oh, I am very glad I have my mother's fortune for you, dear Bereseligh; but now I can rejoice freely with dear Laura and Ferdinand."

"Then come and rejoice with them at once, dearest. And let us have some champagne, as in the days of drink of the new Baron and Baroness Etheridge," said the duke, drawing her arm within his, and leading her back to the table, where they rejoined Laura and Ferdinand.

One week from that day a large party was assembled in the sumptuous library at Bereseligh House. It consisted of the Duchess Dowager and the young Duke and Duchess of Bereseligh, the Baron and Baroness Etheridge, the widowed Lady Lanter, and her sister, Ruthven, Colonel Hastings, and lastly, poor Ruth Russel.

They were brought together by a common interest in the confession of Robert Thugsen, through whose atrocious crimes nearly every one present had deeply suffered.

The confession of a notorious criminal is not a pleasant subject for review in detail. Yet it is due to the reader to throw some little light upon the early career of this man.

Robert Thugsen was the natural knowledged son of a nobleman in one of the central countries of England, and had a legal right only to his mother's family name. His father had purchased him a commission in the army, where the hereditary vices of the young man rapidly developed themselves in a career of profligacy which ended in his dismissal from the service.

Disgraced and impoverished, but still handsome and fascinating, he eloped with the only daughter and heiress of a wealthy manufacturer in Leeds. The deeply-wronged father sent his erring daughter a thousand pounds, but refused ever afterward to see her or her profligate husband, and dying two years afterward, left the whole of his property to his patron, Colonel Hastings. Captain Thugsen having spent his wife's small fortune, and being disappointed of the fortune, and weary of the woman whom he had married only for her money, soon abandoned his wife and children, leaving them in obscure lodgings in London, and betaking himself to the fashionable watering-places, where his handsome person, fascinating manners, and well-filled purse, enabled him to get on in certain sets.

At these places he always passed as a single man, or under some assumed, changed his name. It was at Brighton that his first real passion led him into the first crime.

Here he first met the family of Sir Vincent Lester, and with them Mrs. Ravenscroft, a young and beautiful widow, the sister of the baronet. She was known to be engaged to Lord Barlington, an old and very broken-backed bachelor, whose enormous unincumbered property was the temptation to persuading her to accept his proposals of marriage. From the moment that Thugsen became acquainted with her he resolved to win her love. The circumstance of his own marriage seemed to present no impediment to them. The fact that she was the betrothed of another. Indeed, to a man of Captain Thugsen's character, these circumstances only added zest to the pursuit of the lady. In a word, he won the passionate love of this fond woman. The lovers met in secret, and took long walks on the loneliest part of the beach.

Thugsen urged her to fly with him to the Continent, but Helen was scarcely prepared for such a desperate measure. She said that if Lord Barlington were only out of the way, she would consent to become the wife of Captain seen. She never dreamed of the deep depravity that could put a false construction upon her words, and dare to obey their supposed meaning. Fortunately for Lord Earlington, whose suspicions had been aroused, wrote a civil note to Thugsen, requesting the latter to afford him a private interview at his earliest convenience. Thugsen smiled with demoniac pleasure at the receipt of this note, and wrote a reply, requesting Lord Earlington to meet him at supper in a certain secluded coombe in the downs.

Lord Earlington kept the tryst, and Thugsen, awaiting him in that solitary spot, sprang upon him, and buried a dagger to the hilt in his breast, and it was only then, from the lips of the dying man, Thugsen learned that Lord Earlington was his father, who, in a late repentance, had sought that interview with the purpose of acknowledging his son, yielding up Helen to the latter, and endowing the young couple with a portion of his large fortune.

Transfixed with horror, Thugsen could only stand and gaze upon the face of his dying parent until he was aroused by the presence of Sir Vincent Lester, who, having followed the hounds all day, just chanced upon this reencounter.

The baronet, who saw at a glance what had happened, and who, indeed, had been a witness to a part of the conversation, summoned Thugsen to surrender, and accompany him back to the town. But Thugsen sprang into his saddle, and fled with the sin of parricide blackening his soul.

With the after-part of this criminal's career, the reader is already acquainted.

Sir Vincent had the body of the murdered peer conveyed to Brighton, where, upon his person, was found the note of Captain Thugsen summoning Lord Earlington to that fatal trysting place. The aristocrat was informed of the death of Lord Earlington, by the hand of Captain Thugsen, and the latter, who knew the relationship that existed between the murderer and his victim, and that her lover's soul was not attuned to the awful crime of parricide, yet, from hearing of the crime, and their flight together, she shut out reason, though, alas! she never lost her mad passion for the criminal. With the cunning of partial insanity, she listened until she learned that her brother possessed the note of Thugsen that had summoned Lord Earlington to the meeting. With the cunning of the maniac, she watched her opportunity, and stole this note, and awaited until she found a way of putting it into the possession of Thugsen, which she did by throwing it to him from the carriage window while she was driving in the park.

Upon learning this fact, Sir Vincent Lester had deemed it expedient to enlighten the unhappy woman upon two points—firstly, that he himself was the witness of Thugsen's crime; secondly, that the crime was not an ordinary murder, but damning parricide! Upon hearing this awful disclosure, Lady Helen became a raving maniac, and was conveyed to a lunatic asylum, where she soon after died.

These facts were gathered, partly from the confession of Thugsen, and partly from the statements of the three parties present in the library.

Several practical goods resulted from these disclosures; first, Colonel Hastings refunded to Ruth Russel, or Mrs. Thugsen, as she should be called, the property of her father; secondly, the proven fact of Thugsen's first marriage showed his attempted second marriage to be an imposture, and vindicated the honor of the young Duchess of Bereseleigh.

The trial before the House of Lords might have been arrested, but the friends of the young duchess desired at least investigation of that affair by that high tribunal essential to the triumph of right. Consequently, upon the appointed day, the trial came off, and resulted, as every one foresaw, in the triumphant vindication of the fair fame of the Duchess of Bereseleigh; for the decision of the peers was accompanied by the strongest censure of the parties who had charged her grace upon such trivial grounds, and the highest eulogium upon the character of the young duchess as it had been revealed to them through the investigation.

That the result of that trial was a most triumphant vindication of the Duchess of Bereseleigh.

Lord and Lady Etheridge had only remained to see the end of this investigation, and to congratulate their sister and brother upon its happy conclusion, before they set out upon a late bridal tour over the Continent.

They were absent three months, and at the end of that time they returned to England, and sent their servants down in advance to prepare for their reception at Swinburne Castle.

The people of Swinburne, let it now be confessed, had never been reconciled to the change of local dynasty that had given them the lauiness' daughter as their liege lady. They had never believed in the claims of Rose, and had always looked upon her as an usurper.

When, therefore, the servants of their own Lady Etheridge arrived at the Etheridge Arms with the intelligence that their lord and lady were coming down to the castle, nothing could exceed the joy of the villagers and tenantry.

The same group that had assembled two years before at the Etheridge Arms to see the arrival of the coach that was to bear the bridegroom, who was about to marry their lady, gathered once more in the taproom, to get all the news they could from the servants, who had stopped there for refreshment on their way to the castle, whither they were bound to prepare for the reception of the baron and baroness, who were coming next week.

There was the village smith, and the old laborer from Swinburne Chase, and the old cashiered groom, and all the others.

And none there were so poor that they could not invest a sixpence in drinking the health of their beloved lady, whom they quite regarded in the light of a restored queen.

And there were none so niggardly as not to spend their money and labor in order to add illumination to the village for the reception of the happy pair who were coming to reside among them.

So, that the next week when the Baron and Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne entered their feudal village, it was with the state of a king and queen entering their capital city, amid the parade of the county militia, under a triumphal arch formed of evergreens, and over a road strewn with flowers by the village maidens, who stood each side the way singing a joyous epithalamium.

THE END.

Youngster, (if unphaist)—Father, I am not sitting on the lowest form now. Father—That's right, my boy. Here's a shilling for you. But tell me how you came to get on to the lowest form?

Youngster—I'm the lowest form a-being painted.

HAT TRICKS OF M.P.'S

REMARKABLE WAY OF CINCHING "SEAT" IN BRITISH COMMONS.

Hat May Become an Ornament of Debate — How Sir Frank Lockwood's Utility Hat Held the Fort For Him —Two-Hat Trick Spoiled by Over Popularity — A Member's Corporeal Presence Is Necessary Now.

It is one thing to possess a hat, and another to know what to do with it. In the British House of Commons the rules and regulations concerning hats are many and varied. For instance, an honorable member may wear a hat while in his seat, but he must on no account put it on before he gets there, and he must take it off as he leaves. A member sauntering in and out of the sacred precincts with his hat on would raise a din loud enough to awaken the seven sleepers, and catch the Speaker's eye into the bargain. Another rule concerning hats is that when the House has been cleared for a division, a member is not permitted to address the Speaker without a hat on. They do say that on one occasion the G.O.M. could have worn a bucket or a punch-bowl without being wholly lost to sight and memory dear, but that is another story.

An M. P. can do things with a tophat which he could do but inglorious-ly and ineffectively with a cap. There is no glory in a cap, and this is why Mr. Keir Hardie has never attained unto the name. A top-hat can be utilized as a repository for a written speech or a hidden newspaper, both luxuries forbidden.

Ornament of Debate.

In many ways can a hat upon to give finish and eclat to a peroration, and in this way it has become an ornament of debate in the House of Commons. You can drop down on a cap after asking a searching question on the position of affairs in Timbuctoo, and it is still as good as ever it was; but sit on a shining topper in the same circumstance, and by it is no more! It can only be used afterwards as a wind instrument in a concerting band.

The Speaker—he was shivered in his undergarment because wicked Irish leaders stole his never-ceasing chestnuts—once did a fine oratorical performance with a top-hat. It is a detail that the glory accidental, and that the hat was not his own. He was orating on the woes of Erin, and, raising his hand with one of those mighty gestures which have given him a reputation and a name, he drove home his argument with such vehemence force on the headgear of a "gintleman from the other side" that the House lost its wonted calm, and the honorable member would ever be rescued. But the mighty-least record still bounds, as C.-B., who was the unspeakable honor of having his hat banged off his head, and trundled down the floor of the House twice in succession by a declamatory enthusiast who sat behind him.

Hat Held Fort For Him.

Those were days when you could get even more out of a top-hat when you tried hard than you can do—day. The hat-trick was then a lovely, subtle ingenious thing. One day the late Sir Frank Lockwood, a very good fellow, and gentleman through and through, dropped into the House at five o'clock in the morning, left a utility hat which he kept for the purpose in his locker, drove to his chamber, read up the case of Regina versus somebody or other, had breakfast at the Cock, and then went up to the Old Bailey Court and addressed the gallows of his respected client. All the while his utility hat had been holding the fort for him.

When he entered the House again an Irish member, crowded out of the seats below, was requesting the ruling of the Speaker on the point whether a member could deposit one hat in his seat, and then leave the House to pursue his ordinary avocations in another hat, while another poor fellow, crowded out, was driven to address the House from the roof. The Speaker ruled against two hats for one head, and so Lockwood's relented. That was the hat-trick of his own account, and part of it, at all events, is history.

Two-Hat Trick Spoiled.

While it lasted, the two-hat-trick could not be beaten; but, like all good things, it was spoiled by over-popularity. Busy merchants and stock-brokers used to enter the House with squash hats under their arms, unfurl them by the touch of a spring, deposit them on the seats they like best, and go their ways to ply a roaring trade.

From hats it got to gloves. The rule was established that no one once entered the House with an armful of hats to peg out claims for Erin, and when he had used them up, took off his coat, and made an effort to set up freehold and ancient rights for the seat it covered. The wicked way, I own, lay on the introduction of the Home Rule Bill, Mr. Austen Chamberlain swooped down to Westminster in a four-wheeler full of hats, and that he deposited them in the House as far as they would go.

Obviously, this sort of thing could not be allowed. It was not cricket, and the Speaker made the rule of one man one hat.

Corporeal Presence Now.

But hopefully the wicked Sir Charles Dilke and the genial Labouchere, who ere he departed the sunny clime of Westminster in a huff, gaily of nations, concocted a conspiracy. One summer's afternoon, Mr. Sydney Gedge, viewing were bound to prepare for the reception of the baron and baroness, who were coming next week.

There was the village smith, and the old laborer from Swinburne Chase, and the old cashiered groom, and all the others.

And none there were so poor that they could not invest a sixpence in drinking the health of their beloved lady, whom they quite regarded in the light of a restored queen.

And there were none so niggardly as not to spend their money and labor in order to add illumination to the village for the reception of the happy pair who were coming to reside among them.

So, that the next week when the Baron and Baroness Etheridge of Swinburne entered their feudal village, it was with the state of a king and queen entering their capital city, amid the parade of the county militia, under a triumphal arch formed of evergreens, and over a road strewn with flowers by the village maidens, who stood each side the way singing a joyous epithalamium.

THE END.

Youngster, (if unphaist)—Father, I am not sitting on the lowest form now. Father—That's right, my boy. Here's a shilling for you. But tell me how you came to get on to the lowest form?

Youngster—I'm the lowest form a-being painted.

HUMOR

STORIES OF BARNUM.

The Elephant With Two Trunks—Experience With a Cat.

There is a characteristic story told of Barnum of the partnership between Barnum and Bailey in the circus business. P. T. Barnum was the undoubted leader in his line of endeavor, but when Bailey, Hutchinson & Cooper plastered every fence with lithographs of "Gib, the only living elephant with two trunks," and in consequence crowded their tents with eager sightseers in every town the great showman felt that his pre-eminence was challenged.

"Dan," he said to his secretary, "did you ever see Gib?"

"No," said the secretary.

"Has he really got two trunks?" mused Mr. Barnum.

"Can't say for sure," said the secretary, "but they keep on saying so good and loud."

"Dan," said the showman, "we've got to have Gib."

He reached for a telegraph blank and scribbled the following dispatch to Bailey:

Will give you $10,000 for Gib, the elephant with two trunks.

P. T. BARNUM.

In the very next town that he visited the veteran showman came face to face with his telegram accurately reproduced on his rivals' posters, staring at him wherever he went, and underneath these words:

That's how much P. T. Barnum thinks of the famous Gib, the only elephant in the world with two trunks!

"Dan," said Mr. Barnum to his faithful secretary, "it's not the elephant we want. It's that man Bailey."

This naturally suggests Mr. Barnum's experience with the famous cherry colored cat which a visitor offered to sell him.

"A cherry colored cat would certainly be an attraction," said Mr. Barnum, "and if you really have one I'll give you $100 for her."

In due course the man returned with a fine cat. "Why, that's not a cherry colored cat!" exclaimed Mr. Barnum. "She's black as a coal hole."

"Haven't you ever seen black cherries?" plaintively queried the owner of the cat.

It is said that Mr. Barnum paid him $100, according to promise. But if he did it is reasonably certain that he made up the sum in several hundred dollars' worth of advertising out of the incident.—Woman's Home Companion.

Without Duty.

An American landing in Liverpool was asked by the customs officer whether he had anything dutiable—wine, spirits or cigars. He answered that he had nothing but wearing apparel, but search revealed a dozen bottles of whisky.

"I thought you said you had only wearing apparel," remarked the customs officer dryly, "but come all these?"

"These," replied the American artfully, "are my nightcaps."—Philadelphia Ledger.

A GLACIER'S SECRET.

Held by the Zmut For Forty Years and May Soon Be Solved.

There appeared recently in a morning daily paper a brief telegram from Zermatt to the effect that guides had been searching the lower portion of the Zmut glacier for the body of Lord Francis Douglas.

This announcement was probably startling to not a few people, many doubtless imagining that some quite recent mountaineering tragedy had occurred, involving the death of a member of the British aristocracy, of which till that moment they had heard nothing.

As a matter of fact, however, the death of Lord Francis Douglas occurred exactly forty-one years ago, and that the body is only now being sought for is explainable by the fact that it is the summer "due" at the glacier's tongue.

For this is the way of glaciers. A man falls into a crevasse high up near the source of one of these slowly moving ice rivers. The intense cold preserves the body, and the glacier bears it with it to the valley far below, to disgorge it at last not infrequently as fresh and perfect as on the day it first gripped it.

Many bodies have been thus delivered up after the lapse of forty, fifty, sixty and even more years, and in some instances exceedingly accurate forecasts, based on the known velocities of particular glaciers, have been made as to the time of such deliverances. It is generally agreed among geologists that the Zmut glacier ought to disgorge the remains of Lord Francis—assuming that they are ever again to see the light of day—this year or next.

The accident which cost Lord Francis his life occurred during the first ascent of the Matterhorn and was due to the breaking of the rope which held the pioneers together. Four of them fell 4,000 feet to their deaths, but the bodies were recovered shortly afterward.—London Standard.

Scarless Surgery.

Scarless surgery is one of the latest achievements in medical science. The London surgeon who conceived the idea has successfully put it in practice is unable to meet the demands for his services. The idea is a simple one. In making the first incision the surgeon does not cut the skin at right angles with the surface, but passes through it at a slant. After the operation is over the skin is joined with the greatest nicety, a magnifying glass being used to see that the contact is perfect. Then a rigid dressing of wool and glass is applied to prevent contraction, and as much pressure is applied as is safe. Naturally, much depends upon the skill of the operator. The surgeon who perfected the process devotes himself entirely to making incisions in the skin and treating them afterward, leaving the operating proper to others.—Cleveland Leader.

CITY THAT HAD "SAND."

How Galveston Is Still Raising Itself Above Floodline.

Each day the solid wall crept farther along the gulf front until at length it stretched four and a half miles, guarding the whole corporate length to its outer limits, and on top of this the city has undertaken a task unparalleled in history, but which is now one-third completed—to lift itself bodily above the flood line. A district as large as all that part of Manhattan below Houston street is being raised to a height in places fifteen feet above its present level. It was not an open country or a tract of waste land which was to be lifted. It was the major part of an active, vigorous town, the most important business center of the southwest. Before the lines, gas pipes, water mains, houses, churches, all the complex mechanism of a metropolis, had to be elevated an average of nine feet above the old grade. No less than 11,000,000 cubic yards are needed to complete this work.

Eleven million cubic yards! The quantity conveys no definite idea to most. What it really meant for the gulf city to undertake this work could be realized from comparisons. Galveston is the second export city of the United States. During the last fiscal year 1,675 ships cleared here for both United States and foreign ports vessels of a total of 1,702,478 net registered tons. This tonnage is an equivalent of 1,826,000 ocean tons.

If every vessel clearing from the port of Galveston last year had been loaded with sand to her full net tonnage capacity the amount carried away would be less than one-sixth of what is being used in raising the grade. The material the contract would make five pyramids as large as that of Cheops. If every vessel flying the American flag were required to bring out its cargo of sand it would take three trips of this great fleet to meet Galveston's need. This is the magnitude of the public work that the city of less than 40,000 souls has undertaken with no outside aid save the retention of its own state taxes for seventeen years.

The people of Galveston have built a solid concrete sea wall four and a half miles long at a cost of $1,500,000 and have paid for it in cash. Behind and backed the wall up with a hundred feet of solid filling and are now raising the greater portion of the city to an average height of fourteen and a half feet above sea level at a cost of $2,200,000 further.

The solution of the problem of raising Galveston was an engineering feat. No tool in America could accomplish the work within the city's resources, and hauling material by rail cost $500,000 more than the municipal tax limit would allow. Suction dredges could not pump sand three miles into the heart of the city. The solution lay in the radical proposal of driving a canal into the heart of the city and using self propelled dump scows. Nothing produced in Europe, which could take their loads from the ship channel, steam up the canal and discharge the material under the houses and through the streets.

The operation of these engineering Titans possesses a certain fascination. They steam over or alongside a sand bank. The main engines actuate a large centrifugal pump, whose function it is to take up material and discharge it into the hoppers. "Kreisel pompe," or whirlpool pump, was the name given it by the old Prussian pioneer who first applied this principle to hydraulic dredging. The pump forms a small maelstrom, sucking up into the interior of the dredge sand, mud, etc., with 80 to 90 per cent of sea water. Then with a full load of hundreds of tons the dredge steams across the navigable channel, up the temporary canal and pipes the mixture on to the lots and appointed streets.

Two years more will see the accomplishment of this great undertaking. The sea wall will withstand the fury of the wildest storms. The raising of its grade will lift the city above the highest point of the highest flood. The incubus which has for so long overshadowed this entrepot of the southwest will vanish. Galveston's legitimate future will have to its realization no vital barrier.—Scientific American.

The Sycamore.

Sycamore is a very durable wood. A statue carved from it, now in the museum at Ghizeh, Egypt, is reported sound and natural in appearance although nearly 6,000 years old.

Ancient Speaking Trumpet.

The ancient Chluese had a kind of speaking trumpet by which the words could not only be heard, but also understood, at a great distance. A very ancient manuscript of Aristotle preserved in the Vatican mentions that Alexander had a prodigious large horn with which he could assemble his army at a distance of 100 stadia, or eight Italian miles.

The Canal du Midi.

Toulouse, France, has a canal which was built entirely at the expense of one man. Its name is the Canal du Midi. It was built in 1666-81 and cost Paul Riquet 680,000,000 francs.

Odd Nesting Place.

A large centrifugal pump at a Brighton (England) bath is stopped working, and an examination revealed the presence in a pipe of a pigeon's nest with two eggs. To reach its nest the bird had to find its way through a six inch diameter pipe, horizontal for six feet and bending sharply into a six foot perpendicular.

European Marmots.

European marmots remain dormant during the winter. Before becoming torpid they carefully cement the entrance to their dwelling.

Northwestern Ohio.

Northwestern Ohio, south of the counties bordering on Lake Erie, had a late slow start in industrial development and in population. The Indians were in possession long after they departed from the rest of the state. The forest was dense, and the land was hard to clear. Transportation facilities were poor.

Virginia.

Virginia was the first British colony to have a parliament of its own.

The Greatest Surrender.

The greatest surrender on record is that of Mets, on Oct. 27, 1870. The surrender included 3 field marshals, 66 generals, 6,000 other officers, 400 guns, 100 standards and 173,000 rank and file.

Forest Land.

In forest land 50 per cent more rain soaks into the ground than in open country.

The Iron Crown.

The famous iron crown of Lombardy, used in the coronation of Italian monarchs, is undoubtedly the oldest crown in existence. It was used by Charlemagne.

BALL FIELD STORIES

ODD INCIDENT THAT ONCE WON A GAME IN CHICAGO.

A Bucket of Paint Helped the Orioles Capture the National League Pennant—The Importance of a "Color-Scheme" in Batting.

One of the oddest things that ever happened on a ball field took place on the west side grounds, in Chicago, in a game against New York. Anson's men were playing the Giants, and the contory hung in the balance until in the ninth inning, with the score even, Bill Lange faced Jouet Meekin and rammed his right arm into the earth and commenced reaching. Lange meantime kept on. He turned second, raced on to third, took a look outward and then sprinted for home, scoring the winning run.

The ball had rolled into a hole in the ground from which a post had been pulled that morning, and Van Haltren had been able only to reach it with the tips of his fingers. The next day the hole was filled in.

Upon what small things the results of baseball depend can be guessed when it is known that a forty-five cent bucket of paint won the National league pennant for Baltimore two years in succession. The men who composed the three times champion Orioles all admit the fact that the bucket of paint had more to do with their pennant winning than anything else.

The facts are these: The Orioles were not hitting. They could not find out why until one day Willie Keeler remarked that at bat when pitched the pitcher's box was the same color as the center field fence and that the ball was lost in the background. The players discussed. The players set themselves down to figure it out, and in the end they figured that the reason they were not hitting was because there was a lack of relief in the color scheme of the grounds. The bat boy was sent in a hurry for a pot of white paint and a batch of it was thrown on center field exactly on a line with the pitcher's box, and the plate was daubed white. The paint made a difference from the first pot-full put on. Batting improved, and the outfielders have great difficulty in seeing the ball until it rises out of the shadow and comes into the sky line. The players learn to judge balls by the way they sound against the bat, but visiting players at the Polo grounds have a hard time judging line drives.

For years the New York players have had the advantage because of the color scheme of their grounds. In center field is a panel of color to relieve the batter's eye and show the ball in relief against it, while to mitigate the effects of the shadow sections of the front of the stand and even the bowlders on the hillside have been painted.

Those mechanically inclined say that a baseball almost every home team has its grounds arranged for relief in color, so that they can by looking at a certain spot be certain to see the ball. It is not ngcessary for the ball to rise against the relief background, but it is necessary for the player's eye to be able to follow it. Once it is in the air it should be visible, and that when he looks at the ball it stands out in relief against the color which still is imprinted on the retina of his eye.

One of the best hitting pitchers that ever lived, Walter Thornton, who was driven out of baseball because of the "fly ball" rule, was a member of the National league to him, had a scheme which worked well and which he claimed aided him in batting. He simply had the bat boy squeeze a sponge before his eyes for several minutes before going to bat. Shutting out all light, he claimed, rested his eyes after pitching and batting, and he went in to bat with eyes fresh and steady.

And how he did hit them! How he did hit them!

Pietro Gladiator Browning tried every treatment possible for his eyes to keep them clear. Smoking a cigarette on the bench was one of his ideas, and he carried an eye wash with him which he poured into his eyes just before going to bat.

Most of the schemes of players to keep their "eyes in," as they say, are ridiculous, but there is no reason why a lot of players should not follow Hlrady the advice of the bleacherites and "see an oculist." Any good oculist can devise a color scheme that will help the batter.—Hugh S. Fullerton.

BY-LAW NO.

OF THE CORPORATION OF THE TOWN OF NAPANEE.

A By-law to authorize the issue of debentures of the Town of Napanee, to the amount of $5,000, for the purpose of providing funds for the payment of the cost of the Dundas Street Sewer.

Whereas the Corporation of the Town of Napanee has constructed a sewer on West and Dundas streets, as the Town of Napanee, known as the Dundas Street Sewer at a cost of $10000;

And whereas it is desirable that the said cost should be paid and that the said sum should be raised upon the credit of the Town, and

Whereas, in order thereto it will be necessary to issue debentures of the Municipality to the amount of $5000 on the credit of the debt intended to be created by this by-law, the proceeds of the said debentures to be applied to the said purpose and no other, and

Whereas it is desirable to issue the said debentures at one time and to make the principal of the said debentures payable by yearly sums during the period of twenty years, being the currency of the said debentures, and the yearly sums being of such respective amounts that the aggregate amount payable in each year for principal and interest, at the rate of four per centum per annum, in respect of the said debentures so issued, shall be nearly as may be equal to the amount so payable in each of the other nineteen years during the said period.

And whereas the total amount required to be raised annually by special rate for paying the said debt and interest as hereinafter provided, is the sum of $367.91.

And whereas the whole amount of the whole rateable property of the Municipality, according to the last revised assessment roll, is the sum of $1,104,883.

And whereas the amount of the yearly ...ditures debt of the said Municipality is $68,739.86, exclusive of local improvements debt secured by special rates or assessments and over and above the amount to be raised for principal and interest in each year.

Therefore, the Municipal Council of the Corporation of the Town of Napanee enacts as follows:

1. That for the purpose of raising the sum of $5000, debentures of the Town of Napanee amounting to the sum of $5000 as aforesaid, in the sum of $367.91 each shall be issued and dated the 1st day of February, A.D. 1908, each of which debentures shall be dated on the date of the issue thereof, and shall be payable one on the first day of February in each of the years from 1908 to 1927, both inclusive, at the office of the Treasurer of the Town of Napanee, with interest, the interest calculated at the rate of four per centum per annum on the said loan being included in the sum and the sum of debentures.

2. It shall be lawful for the Mayor of the said Municipality, and he is hereby authorized and instructed to issue and cause the said debentures to be issued, and to sign the same to be signed by the Treasurer of the said Municipality, and for Clerk of the said Municipality is hereby authorized and instructed to attach the seal of the said Municipality to the said debentures.

3. That during the currency of the said debentures there shall be raised annually by special rate on all the rateable property in the said Municipality, the sum of $367.91, for the purpose of paying the amount of each of the said years for principal and interest on the said debentures.

4. This By-law shall take effect on the day of the date of the final passing thereof.

5. The votes of the electors of the Town of Napanee shall be taken on this by-law on Monday, the Seventh day of January, A.D. 1907, commencing at the hour of nine o'clock a.m. the forenoon, and continuing till the hour of five o'clock p.m. of the same day, by the following Deputy Returning Officers, and at the following places, that is to say:

For West Ward No. 1, at Frank K. Kirk's residence, C. W. Bowen, Deputy Returning Officer.

For West Ward No. 2, at Mrs. J. H. Cooper's residence, Geo. Wartman, Deputy Returning Officer.

For Centre Ward No. 1, Town Hall, Geo. Waters, Deputy Returning Officer.

For Centre Ward No. 2, at Chas. Pollard's residence, Patrick Gleeson, Deputy Returning Officer.

For East Ward, Perry's Woole mill office, Geo. Perry, Deputy Returning Officer.

6. On Saturday, the fifth day of January, A.D. 1907, the Council of the said Town of Napanee, shall attend at the Council Chamber, at 12 o'clock noon, to appoint persons to attend at each of the said polling places, and at the final summing up of the votes by the Clerk on behalf of such persons interested in and promoting or opposing the passing of this by-law respectively.

7. The Clerk of the Council of the said Town of Napanee shall attend at his office on the 7th day of January, A.D. 1907, at the hour of ten o'clock in the forenoon, to sum up the number of votes given for and against this by-law.

8. And that the 5th day of December, A.D. 1906.

Mayor. Clerk.

Take notice that the above is a true copy of a proposed by-law, which has been taken into consideration, and that it will be finally passed by the Council of the Municipality of the Town of Napanee, in the event of the consent of the electors being obtained thereto, after one month from the first publication in The Napanee Beaver, the same having been first published on the 7th December, A.D. 1906, and that the names of the electors of the said Municipality entitled to vote thereon are the persons on the list of the hours and places therein fixed.

Dated, December 6th, 1906.

W. A. GRANGE, Town Clerk.

CHAPTER I.

FAR off in the mountain lands, somewhere to the east of the setting sun, lies the principality of Graustark, serene relic of rare old feudal days. The traveler reaches the little domain after an arduous, sometimes perilous, journey from the great European capitals, whether they be north or south or west —never east. He crosses great rivers and wide plains; he winds through fertile valleys and over barren plateaus; he twists and turns and climbs among somber gorges and rugged mountains; he touches the cold clouds in one day and the placid warmth of the valley in the next. One does not go to Graustark for a pleasure jaunt. It is too far from the rest of the world, and the ways are perilous. Napanee, abounding of the strife among the tribes of the intervening mountains. If one hungers for excitement and peril, he finds it in the journey from the north or the south into the land of the Graustarkians. From Vienna and other places almost directly west the way is not so full of thrills, for the railroad skirts the darkest of the danger lands.

Once in the heart of Graustark, however, the traveler is charmed into dreams of peace and happiness and—paradise. The peasants and the poets sing in one voice and accord, their psalm being of never ending love. Down in the lowlands and up in the hills the simple worker of the soil rejoices that he lives in Graustark; in the towns and villages the humble merchant and his thrifty customer unite to sing the song of peace and contentment; in the palaces of the noble the same patriotism warms its heart with thoughts of Graustark, the ancient. Prince and people are united in the love of the land, while outside the great, heartless world goes rumbling on without a thought of the rare little principality among the eastern mountains.

In point of area Graustark is but a mite in the great galaxy of nations. Glancing over the map of the world, one is almost sure to miss the infinitesimal patch of green that marks its location. One could not be blamed if he regarded the spot as a typographical or topographical illusion. Yet the people of this quaint little land hold in their hearts a love and a confidence that are not surpassed by any of the lordly monarchs who measure their patriotism by miles and millions. The Graustarkian is sturdy, courageous and brave. From the faraway century when they fought themselves clear of the Tartar yoke to this very hour they have been warriors of might and valor.

The boundaries of their tiny domain were kept inviolate for hundreds of years, and but one victorious foe had come down to lay siege to Edelweiss, the capital. Axphain, a powerful principality in the north, had conquered Graustark in the latter part of the nineteenth century, but only after a bitter war in which starvation and famine proved far more destructive than the arms of the victors. The treaty of peace and the indemnity that fell to the lot of vanquished Graustark have been recounted upon at length in at least one history.

Those who have followed that history must know, of course, that the reigning prince, Lorry Vetiver, was married to a young American at the very tag end of the nineteenth century. This admirable couple met in quite romantic fashion while the young sovereign was traveling incognito through the United States of America. The American, a splendid fellow named Lorry, was so persistent in the subsequent attack upon her heart that all ancestral prejudices were swept away, and she became his bride with the full consent of her entranced subjects. The manner in which he wooed and won this young and adorable creature forms a very attractive chapter in romance, although unmentioned in history. This being the tale of another day, it is not timely to dwell upon the interesting events which led up to the marriage of the Princess Yetive to Grenfall Lorry. Suffice it to say that Lorry won his bride against all wishes and odds and in the same time won an endless love and esteem from the people of the little kingdom among the eastern hills. Two years have passed since that notable wedding in Edelweiss.

Lorry and his wife, the princess, made their home in Washington, but spent a few months of each year in Edelweiss. During the periods spent in Washington and in travel her affairs in Graustark were in the hands of a capable, austere old diplomat, her uncle, Count Caspar Halfont. Princess Volga reigned as regent over the principality of Axphain. To the south lay the principality of Dawsbergen, ruled by young Prince Dantan, whose half brother, the deposed Prince Gabriel, had been for two years a prisoner in Graustark, the convicted assassin of Prince Lorenz of Axphain, one time suitor for the hand of Yetive.

It was after the second visit of the Lorrys to Edelweiss that a serious turn of affairs presented itself. Gabriel had succeeded in escaping from his dungeon. His friends in Dawsbergen stired up a revolution, and Dantan was dri en from the throne at Serros. On

NEWBURGH.

The concert given by the Ladies' Aid in the Methodist church, on Thursday evening last, was one of the best seen in Newburgh for years, but the attendance was very small. A teamsterance was very small. A teamsterious runaway on Monday morning caused a double affected. Mr. Cummings, the driver, was thrown from his rig, but escaped with only a few bruises. Mr. Cummings, by reason of his experience with horses, was able to control the animals before any damage was done.

The Lord is my Light," was perhaps the best number of the night. Another splendid song was the "Thistle, Shamrock and Rose," by Misses Jessie Herrick and Rose. Miss Herrick accompanied.

Miss Bertha Ellis also rendered a solo in a very winning manner, and seemed equally at home in comic selections. She is a favorite on several occasions. Miss Ellis also rendered a recitation with very pleasing effect.

Miss Caroline Fiskle is ill with appendicitis at Dr. Leonard's, Napanee.

Mrs. Hawley Young has had a severe attack of the first class.

Miss Brandon, Morven, spent Sunday and Monday with friends here.

The Village Council voted $40 to the Public Library on Monday night.

COMPLIMENTARY BANQUET.

One of the most successful banquets held in Napanee in years was that given by Messrs. J. A. Pratt and John Hunter, of the Shoe Hall, to W. M. Cambridge's restaurant, on Thursday evening of last week.

About forty guests sat down to a well spread under the capable and careful supervision of Mr. Hunter and Mrs. Cambridge, who, although practical strangers in Napanee, showed by their cuisine that they are not strangers to their line of business.

After a lengthy bill of fare had been thoroughly gone through, the chairman of the evening, Mr. Fred. Curry, proposed the toast "Our King," which was ably responded to by Mr. W. A. Grange.

The toast "Our Guests," Messrs. Edw Graham, Byrne Black, Perry Wagar and Frank Carson, added greatly to the evening's enjoyment by rendering several selections in excellent voice.

The other toasts were ably responded to by gentlemen present, lack of space not permitting us to enumerate.

During the evening Mr. Grange spoke very forcibly on the subject, "Shall we endeavor to have an Old Boys Re-union in Napanee in 1907? All present seemed to be favorably impressed with the idea, and a representative committee was appointed to collect information for the active committee of the organization of last summer.

Messrs. Pratt and Hunter are to be complimented on the success attending their efforts, and all present were a unit in expressing their pleasure and enjoyment of the evening's entertainment.

Among those attending were:

Deafness Cannot be Cured.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken away this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness, caused by catarrh, that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars free.

PRESENTATION.

On Friday evening, a number of the friends and relatives of the neighborhood, met at the home of Mr. John S. Reid, where the following address was read:

Enterprise, Nov. 23d, 1906.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Reid.

We, your relatives and friends of this vicinity, have assembled this evening to express to you our sorrow for your departure from our midst.

We have always found you generous and staunch neighbors, and Mrs. Reid, many times have you been kind and willing to sacrifice your own interests and lend a helping hand to us in time of need.

As a slight token of the esteem in which we hold you both, we ask you to accept these two chairs, bedroom set and hanging lamp, and in years to come may they bring back pleasant recollections of the many friends and well wishers you have in this neighborhood.

We join in our unanimous wish that health, happiness and prosperity may be yours in your new abode. May God spare us to greet you frequently in the future, and we hope you will always receive as hearty a welcome as we have invariably received at your threshold.

Signed on behalf,

Mr. and Mrs. John S. Reid,

Mr and Mrs. Bell very suitably replied and thanked the people for the many kindnesses they had shown them. The entire evening was pleasantly spent. Mr. and Mrs. D. Ward played a number of choice selection on the graniaphone. After supper was served a abundance of cake, sandwiches and coffee, the crowd dispersed, leaving with Mr. and Mrs. Reid their best wishes, and thanking the host and hostess for their hospitality on such an occasion.

IN PRAISE OF CHAMBERLAIN'S COUGH REMEDY.

There is no other medicine manufactured that has received so much praise and so many expressions of gratitude as Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It is effective, and prompt. Those who have used it say so. People everywhere do not hesitate to testify to its merits for the benefit of others. It is a certain cure for coughs, colds, croup and whooping cough. When the attack is given at the first appearance of the disease it is especially adapted to children as it is pleasant to take and acts on the system in such a manner that it is impossible to nauseate. Mrs. Humphreys, a well known resident and dairy farmer of Mr. E. Jack Cape Colony, South Africa, says: "Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is the best cough, cold and croup medicine in my family. I found it to be the best I ever used. Given it a fair trial and you will recommend it." For sale at The Red Cross Drug Store. 49d

E. H. DUNBAR.

One of Ernestown's well known and most highly respected residents passed suddenly away on Tuesday last. Deceased had been in delicate health for a month, but was not confined to bed. He was a man of upright character and sterling worth. His word was as good as his bond. He was tenderly cared for by his faithful companion. His loss is deeply sympathized with by his widow in her sorrow. In religion he was a Methodist, in politics, a staunch Conservative. Besides his wife he leaves two brothers, James, of California, A. J., of Napanee, and two sisters, Mrs. Dolier and Mrs. McGuin, of Napanee; Mrs. J. W. Denyes, of Williamsport, Mrs. Chas. Dolier deceased, and four half sisters all of Toronto. He was born and lived all his life on the same farm on which he died. His end was peace.

Constipation

Baked sweet apples, with some people, bring prompt relief for Constipation. With others, cleanse all-wheat bread will have the same effect. Some undoubtedly has a vegetable remedy to relieve every ailment known to man, if physicians can but find Nature's way to health. And this is strikingly true with regard to Constipation.

The bark of a certain tree in California—Cascara Sagrada—offers a most excellent aid to this end. But, combined with Egyptian Senna, Slippery Elm Bark, Solid Extract of Prunes, etc., this same Cascara bark is given its greatest possible power to correct constipation. A toothsome Candy Tablet, called Lax-ets, is now made at the Dr. Shoop Laboratories, from this ingenuous and effective prescription. Its effect on Constipation, Biliousness, Sour Stomach, Bad Breath, Pallow Complexion, etc., is indeed prompt and satisfying.

Nothing, no unpleasant after effects are exacted, and Lax-ets are put up in beautiful lithographed metal boxes at 5 cents and 25 cents per box.

the arrival of Gabriel at the capital the army of Dawsbergen espoused the cause of the prince it had spurned, and, three days after his escape, he was on his throne, defying Yetive and offering a price for the head of the unfortunate Dantan, now a fugitive in the hills along the Graustark frontier.

CHAPTER II.

MAJOR GEORGE CALHOUN was a member of congress from one of the southern states. His forefathers had represented the same commonwealth, and so, it was likely, would his descendants, if there is virtue in the fitness of things and the heredity of love. While intrepid frontiersmen were opening the trails through the fertile wilds west of the Alleghanies a strong branch of the Calhoun family followed close in their footsteps. The major's great-grandfather saw the glories and the possibilities of the new territory. He struck boldly forward from the old Revolutionary grounds, abandoning the luxuries and traditions of the Carolinas for a freely, wild life of promise. His sons and daughters became solid stones in the foundation of a commonwealth, and his grandchildren are still at work on the structure. State and national legislatures had known the Calhouns from the beginning. Battlefields had tested their valor, and drawing rooms had proved their gentility.

Major Calhoun had fought with Stonewall Jackson and won his spurs, and at the same time the heart and hand of Betty Haswell, the stanchest Confederate who ever made flags, bandages and prayers for the boys in gray. When the reconstruction came he went to congress, and later on became prominent in the United States consular service, for years holding an important European post. Congress claimed him once more in the early nineties, and there he is at this very time.

Everybody in Washington's social and diplomatic circles admired the beautiful Beverly Calhoun. According to his own loving term of identification, she was the major's "youngest." The fair southerner had seen two seasons in the nation's capital. Cupid, standing directly in front of her, had shot his darts ruthlessly and recklessly into the passing hosts, and masculine Washington looked humbly to her for the balm that might soothe its pains. The wily god of love was fair enough to protect the girl whom he forced to be his unwilling, perhaps unconscious, ally. He held his impenetrable shield between her heart and the assaults of a whole army of suitors, high and low, great and humble. It was not idle rumor that said she had declined a coronet or two, that the millions of more than one American Midas had been offered to her and that she had dealt gently but firmly with a score of hearts which had nothing but love, ambition and poverty to support them in the conflict.

The Calhouns lived in a handsome home not far from the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Grenfall Lorry. It seemed but natural that the two beautiful young women should become constant and loyal friends. Women as lovely as they have no reason to be jealous. It is only the woman who does not feel secure of her personal charms that cultivates envy. At the home of Graustark's princess Beverly met the dukes and barons from the far east. It was in the warmth of the Calhoun hospitality that Yetive formed her dearest love for the American people.

Miss Beverly was neither tall nor short. She was of that delightful medium; dender, but perfectly molded; strong, but graceful—an absolutely healthy young person, whose beauty knew well how to take care of itself. Being quite heart whole and fancy free, she slept well, ate well and enjoyed every minute of life. In her blood ran the warm eager impulses of the south; hereditary love of ease and luxury displayed itself in every emotion; the perfectly normal demand upon admiration was an characteristic in her as it is in any daughter of the land whose women are born to expect chivalry and homage.

A couple of years in s. New York "finishing school" for young ladies had served greatly to modify Miss Calhoun's colloquialisms, and many of her delightful "way down south" phrases and mannerisms were blighted by the cold, unromantic atmosphere of a seminary conducted by two ladies from Boston who were too old to marry, too penurious to love and too prim to think that other women might care to do both. There were times, however—if she were excited or enthusiastic—when pretty Beverly so far forgot her training as to break forth with a very attractive "you all!" "aunt honey!" or "go long now!." And when the bands played "Dixie" she was not afraid to stand up and wave her handkerchief. The northern envy that happened to be with her on such occasions usually found himself doing likewise before he could escape the infection.

Miss Calhoun's form was one that painters coveted deep down in their artistic souls. It never knew a dull instant; there was expression in her finest pose. Instead of being inert, genuine life, dwelt in the mobile countenance that turned the head of every man and woman who looked upon it. Her hair was dark brown and abundant; her eyes were a deep gray and looked eagerly from between long lashes of black; her lips were red and ever willing to smile or turn pulatine as occasion required; her brow was broad and fair, and her frown was as dangerous as a smile.

As to her age, if the major admitted, somewhat indiscreetly, that all his children were old enough to vote, her mother, with the reluctance born in women, confessed that she was past twenty, so a year or two either way will determine Miss Beverly's age so far as the telling of this story is concerned. Her eldest brother, Keith Calhoun (the one with the congressional heritage), thought she was too young to marry, while her second brother, Dan, held that she soon would be too old to attract men with matrimonial intentions. Lucy, the only sister, having been happily wedded for ten years, advised her not to think of marriage until she was old enough to know her own mind.

Toward the close of one of the most brilliant seasons the capital had ever known, less than a fortnight before congress was to adjourn, the wife of Grenfall Lorry received the news which spread gloomy disappointment over the entire social realm. A dozen receptions, teas and balls were destined to lose their richest attraction, and hostesses were in despair. The princess had been called to Graustark.

Beverly Calhoun was miserably unhappy. She had heard the story of Gabriel's escape and the consequent probability of a conflict with Axphain. It did not require a great stretch of imagination to convince her that the Lorrys were hurrying off to scenes of intrigue, strife and bloodshed, and that not only Graustark, but its princess, was in jeopardy.

Miss Calhoun's most cherished hopes faded with the announcement that trouble, not pleasure, called Yetive to Edelweiss. It had been their plan that Beverly should spend the delightful summer months in Graustark, a guest at the royal palace. The original arrangements of the Lorrys were hopelessly disturbed by the late news from Count Halfont. They were obliged to leave Washington two months earlier than they intended, and they could not take Beverly Calhoun into danger-ridden Graustark. The contemplated visit to St. Petersburg and other pleasures had to be abandoned, and they were in tears.

Yetive's maids were packing the trunks, and Lorry's servants were in a wild state of haste preparing for the departure on Saturday's ship. On Friday afternoon Beverly was naturally where she could do the most good and be of (the least help—at the Lorrys'. Self-confessedly she delayed the preparations. Respectful maidservants and respectful manservants came often to the princess' boudoir to ask questions, and Beverly just as frequently made tearful resolutions to leave the household in peace—if such a hullabaloo could be called peace. Callers came by the dozen, but Yetive would see no one. Letters, telegrams and telephone calls almost swamped her secretary, and Lorry's solemn old butler fairly gasped under the strain of excitement. Through it all the two friends sat despondent and alone in the front room that once had been the abode of pure delight. Grenfall Lorry was off in town closing up all matters of business that could be dispatched at once. The princess and her industrious retinue were to take the evening express for New York, and the next day would find them at sea.

"I know I shall cry all summer," vowed Miss Calhoun, with conviction in her eyes. "It's just too awful for anything." She was lying back among the cushions of the divan, and her hat was the picture of cruel neglect. For three solid hours she had stubbornly withstood Yetive's appeals to remove her hat, insisting that she could not trust herself to stay more than a minute or two. "It seems to me, Yetive, that your jailers must be very incompetent or they wouldn't have let loose all this trouble upon you," she complained.

"Prince Gabriel is the very essence of trouble," confessed Yetive plaintively. "He was born to annoy people, just like the evil prince in the fairy tales."

"I wish we had him over here," the American girl answered stoutly. "He wouldn't be such a trouble, I'm sure. We don't let small troubles worry us very long, you know."

"But he's dreadfully important over there, Beverly; that's the difficult part of it," said Yetive solemnly. "You see, he is a condemned murderer."

"Then you ought to hang him or electrocute him or whatever it is that you do to murderers over there," spoke Beverly promptly.

"But, dear, you don't understand. He won't permit us either to hang or to electrocute him, my dear. The situation is precisely the reverse. If he is correctly quoted by my uncle, When Uncle Caspar sent an envoy to inform Dawsbergen respectfully that Graustark would hold it personally responsible if Gabriel were not surrendered, Gabriel himself replied, 'Graustark be hanged!'"

"How rude of him, especially when your uncle was so courteous about it! He must be a very disagreeable person," announced Miss Calhoun.

"I am sure you wouldn't like him," said the princess. "His brother, who has been driven from the throne—and from the capital, in fact—is quite different. I have not seen him, but my ministers regard him as a splendid young man."

"Oh, how I hope he may go back with his army and annihilate that old Gabriel!" cried Beverly, frowning fiercely.

"Alas," sighed the princess, "he hasn't an army, and, besides he is finding it extremely difficult to keep from being annihilated himself. The army has gone over to Prince Gabriel."

"Pooh!" scoffed Miss Calhoun, who was thinking of the enormous armies the United States can produce at a day's notice. "What good is a ridiculous little army like his anyway? A battalion from Fort Thomas could beat it to"—

"Don't boast, dear," interrupted Yetive, with a wan smile. "Dawsbergen has a standing army of 10,000 excellent soldiers. With the war reserves she has twice the available force I can produce."

"But your men are so brave!" cried Beverly, who had heard their praises sung.

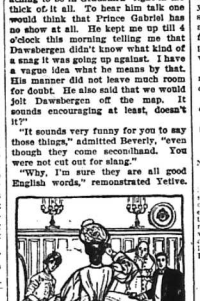
"True—God bless them!—but you forget that we must attack Gabriel in his own territory. To recapture him means a perilous expedition into the mountains of Dawsbergen, and I am sorely afraid. Oh, dear, I hope he'll surrender peaceably!"

"And go back to jail for life?" cried Miss Calhoun. "It's a good deal to expect of him, dear. I fancy it's much better fun kicking up a rumpus on the outside than it is kicking one's toes off against an obdurate stone wall from the inside. You can't blame him for fighting a bit."

"No, I suppose not," agreed the princess miserably. "Gren is actually happy over the miserable affair, Beverly. He is full of enthusiasm and positively aching to be in Graustark—right in the thick of it all. To hear him talk one would think that Prince Gabriel has no show at all. He kept me up till 4 o'clock this morning telling me that Dawsbergen didn't know what kind of a snag it was going up against. I have a vague idea what he means by that. His manner did not leave much room for doubt. He also said that we would jolt Dawsbergen off the map. It sounds encouraging at least, doesn't it?"

"It sounds very funny for you to say those things," admitted Beverly, "even though they come secondhand. You were not cut out for slang."

"Why, I'm sure they are all good English words," remonstrated Yetive.



Her hearers stared at the picturesque recruit.

"Oh, dear, I wonder what they are doing in Graustark this very instant. Are they fighting or"—

"No; they are merely talking. Don't you know, dear, that there is never a fight until both sides have talked themselves out of breath? We shall have the moments of talk and a week or two of fight, just as they always do nowadays."

"Oh, you Americans have such a comfortable way of looking at things," cried the princess. "Don't you ever see the serious side of life?"

"My dear, the American always lets the other fellow see the serious side of life," said Beverly.

"You wouldn't be so optimistic if a country much bigger and more powerful than America happened to be the other fellow."

"It did sound frightfully boastful, didn't it? It's the way we've been brought up, I reckon—even we southerners, who know what it is to be whipped. The idea of a girl like, me talking about war and trouble and all that! It's absurd, isn't it?"

"Nevertheless, I wish I could see things through those dear gray eyes of yours. Oh, how I'd like to have you with me through all the months that are to come. You would be such a help to me, such a joy. Nothing ever seems so hard if you were there to make me see things through your brave American eyes. The princess put her arms about Beverly's neck and drew her close.

"But Mr. Lorry possesses an excellent pair of American eyes," protested Miss Beverly, loyally and very happily.

"I know, dear, but they are a man's eyes. Somehow there is a difference, you know. I wouldn't dare cry when he was looking. I could boohoo all day if you were there to comfort me. He thinks I am very brave, and I'm not," she confessed dismally.

"Oh, I'm an awful coward," explained Beverly consolingly. "I think you are the bravest girl in all the world," she added firmly. "Don't you remember what you did at"— and then she recalled the stories that had come from Graustark ahead of the bridal party two years before. Yetive was finally obliged to place her hand on the enthusiastic visitor's lips.

"Pence," she cried, blushing. "You make me feel like a—a—what is it you call her, a dime novel heroine?"

"A yellow back girl? Never!" exclaimed Beverly severely.

Visitors of importance in administration circles came at this moment, and

PRESENTATION.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. John Deason, Richmond, was the scene of a happy gathering on December 5th, when the family, about twenty-five in all, met to celebrate their golden wedding. After a dainty wedding breakfast they all repaired to the drawing room, where Mr. and Mrs. Deanson were completely surprised with an address read by their eldest son, Mr. S. C. Deanson, during which their daughter, Mrs. Moore, of Brockville, on behalf of the gathering, presented them with a gold-headed ebony cane, a silk umbrella with mother-of-pearl handle, mounted with gold, a gold scarf pin, a gold brooch set with Mrs. Deanson's birth stone, surrounded by diamonds, and a gold lined marmalade spoon.

The happy bride and groom of fifty years were then congratulated by all present, after which a flash light was taken of the company.

Mr. and Mrs. Deanson, who are active and in good health, look scarcely beyond middle age, and led fair to celebrate their diamond jubilee.

Dear Parents,—It affords us, your children and grandchildren, much pleasure to meet to offer greetings on this the golden anniversary of your marriage, it being a privilege that few families enjoy.

While we thank our Heavenly Father that you are both spared and that the family circle has not been broken by death, we also thank Him and you that it has not been broken by discord, but that each can extend to the other the hand of true friendship and love. We have not forgotten that, as children, we did not always think as you would have us, but by your wise counsel and patient example, we have been guided past many obstacles that have beset our path, and brought to see things in harmony with you.

Although our own homes have been established for years, yet our hearts still cling to you and the old homestead, and we always feel that there with you is "Home, Sweet Home."

We seriously realize that we can never repay your life-long care and devotion, but we beg you to accept these tokens of our appreciation and love.

Many have been the happy returnings of the past, and we hope and pray that you may be left with us for many years more to reflect the life of our Saviour and love to us, for of your lives it may be said you have "let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in Heaven." Your sweet influence has not only rested with us your children, but also on those whom you have met with even to complete the family circle. From our infancy, it has been your constant endeavor to fill our minds with Scriptural truths, and to lead us into the true light, and we trust we may all so live that there will not be a link missing in the family chain when we walk the golden streets of the New Jerusalem.

Signed by S. C. Deanson, R. S. Deanson, F. B. Deanson, R. D. Moore, A. D. Felster, L. D. Hambly.

McINTOSH BROS.

JANUARY 2nd, 1907—THE DATE.

Mail-casket from Toronto announces that Ralph Connor's new story "The Doctor" has been secured for the Family Herald and Weekly Star of Montreal, for exclusive newspaper publication. This is a big surprise. Such stories seldom sold to newspapers for months after the book is issued, but the Family Herald is in position to pay the price and land the prize. Her subscribers are to be congratulated. At the end of the opening chapters will be published on January 2d, 1907, so as to give all their subscribers ample time to renew their subscriptions in the meantime there will be a rush from new subscribers, and no wonder. The Family Herald with their beautiful picture, and Ralph Connor's story is certainly a dollar's worth not to be had every day.

SERVICES APPRECIATED.

S. Woodcock, Esq., Chief of the Fire Brigade, Napanee, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I am directed by the General Manager of the Bell Telephone Co. of Canada, to express the appreciation of the company of the prompt and efficient service of your brigade in protecting the premises of property of the company when threatened by fire recently, and I am also instructed to hand to you as a contribution to the funds of the brigade, ten dollars, with the company's hearty thanks. Expressing my own gratitude for your timely assistance.

I remain yours very truly,
Edith M. Scott, Local Manager.

Thanks—The members of the Excelsior Fire Brigade take this means of publicly expressing their thanks to the Local Manager, not only for the donation, but for their appreciation of the services of the fire brigade.

THE ROBINSON CO. LIMITED

Napanee's Biggest and Brightest Christmas Store.

As a store building, The Robinson store is the biggest, handiest and most comfortably arranged in Napanee.

And rich as it has been in stocks each holiday season, we have invested this year nearly five thousand dollars more in goods than we had last year.

A half-dozen buyers who know you and your tastes and wants spent much of the summer looking and buying.

Trained in their work; knowing the sources of supply; being known and catered to by the makers of goods they accomplished a great deal.

That Robinson Co prices are fair is proved by the growth—the immense growth of the business.

FOURTEEN SHOPPING DAYS TILL CHRISTMAS. That's all. Let everybody come; bring the shut-ins; bring the children; get an early breakfast and come. Get to work. There's sunshine, heaps of it; give some to some one who needs it.

Collar Comfort for Men.

Our reputation for good comfortable linen collars for men is growing every week. It is surprising how many are coming to us for our special make of collars, and yet it is not surprising, because we have taken exceptional pains to secure something that will materially add to the comfort of wearing a linen collar.

HURON, 1 3-4, 2 or 2 1-4 inches high, a double band collar, easy to put on, and the most comfortable collar we have ever seen, 15c each, 2 for 25c.

MANITOBA, a double band that is almost a turn down.

ONTARIO, a roll turn down, a good average man's collar.

BEAVER, an older style turn down which the older men appreciate.

CHAMPLAIN, a straight band, dressy collar.

CAPITAL, a very natty turn point shape.

All the above are the popular price, 15c each or 2 for 25c.

Saturday Night Specials for Men.

Saturday, Dec. 8th—Sale of Men's Neckwear at 15c or 2 for 25c.
Saturday Night, Dec. 15th—Sale of Way Mufflers. Any 50c Muffler 40c. Any 25c Muffler 20c.

Linoleums Make Floors Warmer.

Those drafts on the thin kitchen floors can be stopped with a new floor covering of linoleum. A good heavy linoleum will save the price of a new floor and save the head of the kitchen many an hour's work. Being made of cork they are much more restful to walk on. Twenty patterns to choose from four yards wide. Two big makers in Scotland got scrapping over prices. What we have were bot at cut-throat price.

New Carpets for Halls and Stairs.

We have a lot of Carpets designed specially for hall and stairs. As first impressions are to be reckoned with we believe in making the entrance to home just as attractive with floor covering as price will permit. If you are interested let our carpet chief show you what beautiful hall and stair carpets we have. Rich, heavy pile Wiltons and Velvets are at their best in the new carpet shadings of red and green. All stairs have borders, the hall carpets are small designed.

Green Wiltons, two toned, 1.75 yd. Crimson Velvets 1.25 yd. Red and green Oriental Brussels, 1.25 yd. Red Brussels, 1.00 yd. Green and red Tapestry, 75c yd. Red Tapestry, 60c and 75c yd.

Cream Waisting.

At this season of year there is always an extra demand for separate waists. We are good and ready with a splendid assortment to choose from in materials by the yard, Plain and fancies, Lustres, Albratoss, Cashmeres.

WHITE BEARSKIN COATS, CHILDREN.

We start them at 1.75 and from that to 3.75. Same kind of material by the yard.

WHITE SILK SHAWLS.

All pure silk, deep fringe, just the thing for a light wrap for evening wear, 2.50.

Napanee's Greatest Store

Fur Satisfaction.

Have you noticed the number of people who have been able to boast of having received perfect satisfaction from our Fur Department? It is very satisfactory to us to hear our customers' remarks in this line. You will have no trouble in getting just what you want in furs from us this season. No need to go elsewhere when you take into consideration the fact that we stand good for every piece of fur we sell. Now is the time to purchase that jacket you have been talking about.

FRENCH SEAL JACKETS are gaining in favor every day. People who have inspected them, tell us they are the most stylish garment at $0.00 that they have seen.

NEAR-SEAL JACKETS, made in the very latest style, from selected pelts, at 35.00.

ASTRACHAN JACKETS, with long rever fronts, trimmed with blended Muskrat, at 45.00.

ASTRACHAN JACKETS, made from those extra quality German dyed pelts, which makes a very serviceable driving or general purpose garment, in a great variety of lengths, sizes and qualities, at from 20.00 to 50.00.

PERSIAN LAMB JACKETS are having a great sale this season. We prepared for this by placing in stock an extra large stock of these jackets, when we could get the choicest furs. Call on us and ask to see them. It is always a pleasure to show him.

THE BEST FUR LINED COAT on the market for 75.00, is what we are showing and selling in great numbers. Made in 46 in. length, lined with No. 1 Muskrat, trimmed with Natural Alaska Sable.

Our Fur Manufacturing and Repair Department is meeting with marked success. Fur lined jackets made to order, and all kinds of alteration and repair work done in a first class manner.

SATURDAY SPECIAL---MEN'S NECKWEAR---2 FOR 25c.

On Saturday, Dec. 8th, and Saturday evening we will have a special display in our Men's Store of Men's Neckwear at 15c each or 2 for 25c. Included are Four-in-hands, Hook-on Knots, Bows, Band Knots, Flowing Ends, Statesman Puffs, etc. See the display in our east window on Friday, Dec. 7th.

The Evangeline Kid Glove for Women at $1.25.

When selecting your Xmas gloves we wish to call your attention to our "Evangeline" glove at 1.25 pair. It is a very nice soft kid and is appreciated by critical glove buyers. The quality shows up well in the soft tones of fawn, tan, beaver, grey, champagne and black. 2 dome fasteners.

Another Sale of Hand Bags.

Our last special sale of Hand Bags was appreciated so much that we have secured another lot. These are a nine inch leather bag with good nickel trimmings, purse inside, walrus graining, tans, brown, black, green, blue. Price for to-morrow and until sold,

Nova Scotia Wool is famous for its softness and strength. The cross air—the climate—the rich grazing land—gives an elasticity and silkiness and strength to the wool, that is missing in wool from other countries.

The only Underwear in the world, made of Nova Scotia Wool, is

Stanfield's Unshrinkable Underwear

That is one reason why "Stanfield's Unshrinkable" is soft and comfortable—wears so well—holds its shapeliness—and is absolutely unshrinkable. Wear "Stanfield's" this winter—if you want health, and comfort, and durability.

We have the sole agency for Napanee for Stanfield's. Look for the label.

Real Scotch Tartan Travelling and Steamer Rugs.

If you have a friend that contemplates a trip, think of these. Made from pure wool in the genuine Clan Tartan colorings, 4.50 to 7.50.

Silk Blouses, Short Sleeves, for Evening Wear.

Daintly trimmed with lace insertion and silk embroidery, 3.00 to 5.00.

Ladies' Umbrellas Just in for Xmas

Not left over summer has beend, but all new, pretty, catchy effects that are sure to please. Nifty handles styles that are exclusive, 2.00, 2.50, 3.00, 4.00, 5.00.

Silk Waist Patterns in Fancy Boxes for Xmas Givings.

Another lot of Trimmed Hats ready

Millinery Dept. at time of writing this are busy getting ready another lot of trimmed hats for selling to morrow. To clear prices.

Extra Large Black Coats for the Big Good Natured Women.

There are a lot of big people wearing capes and doing without new coats thinking they cannot get coats to fit them. No need to do without any longer. We now have in stock black coats, 3-4 length, to fit bust measure 40, 42, 44, 46, 48 inches, at 8.00, 10.00, 12.50, 17.50. Perhaps you know someone who would like a new one for Xmas. We would be pleased to lay aside and deliver Xmas eve.

Miss Napanee

Miss Napanee Corset.

This corset feels like an old corset from the first moment and looks like a new corset up to the end of its wear. It does not stretch out of shape, because it fits the figure exactly, its shape is that of your figure. We cannot recommend this corset too highly, as we have found it to be the best dollar corset made. This corset is made in two colors, white and dove, with hose supporters attached. When in need of a new pair of corsets ask to see Miss Napanee. All sizes now in stock from 18 to 30.

Acorn Table Oil Cloth

(The Oilcloth with a name).

The reasons why you should use Acorn table oil cloth are,

The Acorn brand is the nearest to perfection made, being the result of years of study in the manufacture of table oil cloth. A large range of patterns to choose from in widths of 45 and 54 inches. The prices are 25c and 30c a yard. It is a brand of goods we have every confidence in, the name is stamped on every yard. Look for the Acorn table oil cloth manufactured for The Robinson Co., Limited.

THE ROBINSON CO'Y. LIMITED.

PROGRESS BRAND CLOTHING

If it is not satisfactory in every respect we will not ask you to take them.

MEN'S $10 and $12 SUITS

Good suits at medium prices are very scarce in most stores this season.

There has been a big advance in the price of woolens, trimmings, labor, and in fact in everything that goes into a suit of clothes.

We anticipated this advance and wisely made provision for our fall stock before it took place.

THE RESULT

To-day we are showing the best $10 and $12 Men's Suits the town affords. The best tailoring—the best fabrics and the best of everything that it is possible for the money to procure.

The man who wants a medium priced fall and winter suit will make a mistake if he fails to come here for it.

Anyone requiring something better, something made up from their own selection, cannot help finding the pattern to please them in our well selected and large stock of woolens.

If you require a new suit or overcoat for Christmas your order should be placed at once, as we are pretty well stocked with orders already. We make the best clothing in this section make it to please the wearer; everything we make we guarantee. The risk is all ours.

Medium Prices Overcoats.

There's no difficulty in buying a good overcoat for $20 or $25. There are plenty of good coats to be found at these prices, but when a man does not care to invest so much money in an overcoat and wants a handsome, stylish garment for say—$10, $12 or $14.

THE SITUATION IS CHANGED

We are showing the finest overcoats at these couservative prices that we have ever offered. There's nothing wanted in fabric, cut or tailoring. Don't think many could distinguish these excellent overcoats from their more lofty associates. For a moderate priced and satisfactory overcoat

THIS IS THE STORE

CHRISTMAS PRESENTS—What about something for your father, brother or somebody else's brother? We've lots of suitable presents such as Gloves, Mitts, Ties, Shirts, Collars, Handkerchiefs, Underwear, Sweaters, Cardigan Jackets, Warm Caps, etc. Don't wait until the last thing. You will find it far more satisfactory in buying early when you can take your own time in selecting.

Mr. and Mrs. L. Robinson, Kingston, and Mr. McVeen, Napanee, at Joe Robinson's on Sunday.

A quiet wedding was solemnized at the home of Mr. J. Sampson, Newburgh, on Thursday, Nov. 29th, when Rev. Radcliffe united in marriage Mrs. Hinch and Mr. John Burgoyne, of this place. We all join in wishing them much happiness.

Mr. and Mrs. S. Adsit, of Garden Island, spent Saturday and Sunday at Jas. Skinner's.

We were sorry indeed to receive word Thursday morning that Mr. Geo. E. Hinch was found dead in his bed at Garden Island. The remains were brought home that day, and the funeral took place in St. Luke's church Sunday morning at 11 o'clock. The church wasn't large enough to accommodate those who came to pay the last respects to one who was loved and esteemed by all. He was a member of the three leading societies of this place, viz., the Orange Order, A.O.U.W., and Chosen Friends. His pall-bearers were chosen from these societies. He leaves a wife and two children to mourn his loss. We do sympathize with his family.

Mrs. Fretts, Napanee, at A. B. Gordanier's.

Mr. and Mrs. G. Lee, Yarker, at her sister's, Mrs. Milligan, Sunday.

PARENTS' LIMITATIONS — HEAVENLY FATHER'S ABUNDANCE.
BRING HIM LARGE PETITIONS
To the King For He Hath Promised That "Whatsoever Ye Shall Ask In My Name That Will I Do"—Practical Lessons Concerning Gifts and the Increasing of the Joys of the Christian Holiday.
Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1906, by Frederick Dixer, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.
Los Angeles, Cal., Dec. 2.—In this sermon, when all are looking forward to the joys of the approaching holidays, the preacher draws a practical lesson concerning gifts, which applies to all classes. The text is John xiv, 13, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name that will I do."
Many years ago the beautiful custom was started of giving Christmas presents. May it never become obsolete. This custom dates as far back as the first Christmas day, when the three wise men came journeying from the east and brought their presents of gold and frankincense and myrth and laid them at the Saviour's feet.
This beautiful custom of Christmas giving is practiced not only in the homes of the rich, but also in the cottages of the poor. It is practiced not only among the young but among the middle aged and those in the twilight of life. But, though Christmas giving means much to all classes of people in Christian lands, I believe that it means the most to those homes where there are a lot of children and where money is not overplentiful, as was the case in the homes of our fathers and mothers, where our brothers and sisters and ourselves grew up side by side.
When I mention the Christmases of our youthful homes the vivid scenes come back to us. They flood the minds and hearts with grateful memories. First we think of the preparations for those Christmases. Our father's income was not very large. The daily demands made upon his wages reduced that income to the utmost. No wonder your father and mother had to figure very close how to make the income meet the necessary outgo. Thus there was not very much money to spend for the Christmas presents. A little money had to be made to go a great way. Now, how did our mothers bridge over the difficulties? This was the way they did it.
A few weeks, or, rather, a couple of months, before Christmas our mother would call all the children together. Then she would give to each a pencil and paper. Then she would say: "Now, my son, I want you to write upon that paper a list of all the things that you would like for Christmas. Do not make your desires too great. Then, if your father and mother can afford it from among those lists we will make our selections and give you what we think you would most enjoy. but you something you may not desire." Then our mother would take the lists that our brothers and sisters and we had made. Every day after the work at the home was done mother would go shopping. My, how tired she used to look when she returned! She would be too tired to eat. Then those mysterious bundles would come home from the store and be piled away in the closet, which would be locked so tight as the one in which the fabled Blueboard kept the decapitated heads of his murdered wives. We remember how, as boys, we used to try to peek through the keyhole of that door and hold a lighted match just under the knob to try to see what was behind that unturnable lock. The longer and the more often we looked the slower that Christmas day crawled around.
Then that going to bed on Christmas eve—why, it did seem as though we never could get to sleep. When we lay awake we could hear the strange rustling downstairs and the mumbling of the delivery wagons coming and going. And when we got out of bed just to look over the banisters to see what was going on our mother would catch sight of our little nightgowns every time and cry: "Come back to bed you! Are you out of bed?" Then we would be so frightened that we could not answer her. All that she could hear was a pattering of little feet as we scurried back to the bed nest. But after a long time (after it seemed as though we had lain awake for at least thirty-six hours, we awoke.
Christmas morning, when the stockings by the bedpost, filled with candy and a few toys, which we grabbed, then the hurried dressing and the hurried breakfast. Mother and father never let us have our toys until after breakfast and Christmas prayers. Then the family formed into line, the youngest at the head and our brothers and sisters going up in steps until the line ended, with mother and father last. Then the door of the back parlor swung open.
Then the Christmas tree—the different colored candles, the bundles each with the owner's name marked upon them and the name of the giver attached. Then from every part of the room can be heard the same cries of delight as the different bundles are opened, then the kisses and the hugs. But after the presents have all been examined and we have time to stop and think we find that for the most part the presents we received were selected from the lists we gave to mother weeks or perhaps two months ago. Ah, yes, that list was a very important one which we gave to our parents. It made our Christmas day happy and blessed.
Ah, those were happy days, when a toy that cost 50 cents could fill our hearts with joy, when a boy was made happy with a pair of skates and his sister with a doll carriage. What could it take now, my brother, my sister, to cause you so much joy? I suppose the deed of a hero—and a horse. What would a sack and a diamond ring might cause some elation.
But it would not be such childlike joy as that you felt over the little gift of those Christmas days of old. The gifts were small, compared with our larger ideas. What would really make you happy now? I don't think any gift in the stores and if I doubt it. Well, then, I want to draw your attention to another world, where one of the best gifts to emit us in the old days, knows your needs and the gifts that will satisfy them.
What our mothers demanded from us when we were little children many years ago, God is now demanding from us now. As the Christmas holiday approaches, God wants us to make out a list of all the gifts we should like from him for the day which commemorates the birth of Jesus Christ. Furthermore, God does not limit us in the sense that our mothers had to limit us, because their revenues were meagre and the outpour taxed all their resources. God comes to us in the same way as Alexander the Great came to his office one day and said, "Make me any request, and if it is possible I will grant it." So God says, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name for the blessed Christmas time in memory of my unspeakable gift, that will I do." Now is not this a blessed offer? Let us try to enumerate some of the Christmas requests we ought to ask of God, which he can and will satisfy if we only come to him in the right Christmas spirit.
The first Christmas request that I should like to ask from God is that I might have the simple faith of my childhood. By that I do not mean simple faith with which I could trust my father and mother and my God, but also the simple faith with which I can trust my brothers and sisters and all those with whom I am associated in life. Ah, that should mean more to you and me than all of unhappy and miserable natures think one of the most miserable in that we call the suspicious nature. Is that awful characteristic which is always hunting for the faults and defects rather than for the virtues of others.
And why should we not make this Christmas request of God? Do not faith in God and faith in man go hand in hand? Are not the goodness and kindness of man manifest in every hand? Did' the spirit of honesty and love and self sacrifice pass away when your mother died? Are not your sisters and brothers doing for their children exactly what you remember once did for you? I believe the reason we take such a depressed view of the human race today is not because people are bad. We simply refuse to open our eyes and see the good qualities of people who are around about us. Satan has placed a blinding cataract over our eyes. Oh, how happy the next Christmas would be if we could only see the good in mank nd rather than the faults of our brothers and sisters! How merry, merry Christmas would then be our next Christmas holiday.
But next to faith in God and faith in our fellow men there is another thing tugging at my heart. That is to make something out of my own life. And when I speak of that I am speaking of a Christmas request inspired by a purely selfish motive. I am not coming to God as a beggar. I do not come in a great man in order that other men may fall down upon their knees and worship me. I am not coming to God, let me fill a position of usefulness in order that I may be of service to my fellow men and help them on in the struggle of life?" That is a just and a holy request to put to Jesus for a coming Christmas present.
Let me illustrate by a simple story. I am a young man. I have a rich father, who is a great merchant. I go to that parent and say, "Father, give me some money that I may buy me a support my wife and children." Then the father gives to me ten, fifty, a hundred thousand dollars, or it may be a noble request. I do not think so. That is the request of the loafer, the miser, the fool. The nothing deadhead. But if I go to my father and say, "Father, do not give the money, but give me a position where I can earn my own wages and give a full return in labor for the money that I receive." That is call that a noble request. The soldier who returns from the war when he is disabled may feel grateful to the king if he gives him a pension to support him during his years of helplessness, but the soldier who is strong physically ought not to want a pension. He should be glad to have had the opportunity to go forth to fight the battles of his country and his king. So the strong Christian should not desire that he may come to God seeking a place of labor. To-day, for this coming Christmas, cannot we say to God: "O God, give us the privilege of earning service. Give to me a place to labor in thy kingdom." This is not a foolish request to make.
It is right and proper for every one to have a healthy ambition. Every man, woman and child, no matter how humble their sphere, should strive to make the most out of life. But, though I should not come to God with that other prayer, "O God, give me a position of usefulness, where I can do something for thy glory!" I should also circumscribe that prayer with another prayer. I should say: "O God, give me a position of earthly influence greater than that which my mental and physical and spiritual capabilities are able to fill." But where there are fifty men who are ready conscientiously to make the first prayer there is hardly one ready to make the second prayer. When we come to God to ask for a position let us pray that gift just as large as possible. And yet, my friends, do you not know there are scores of men absolutely miserable because they are trying to fill too big a place in life? They are trying to do more than God ever meant them to do. Pray God to-day that when he gives to you a position of influence he will give you, too, the mental and physical and spiritual capacity to fill it acceptably.
Life is not always run by the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor riches to men of understanding, nor yet favor to men of skill. But rather, far rather, be a big man in too small a place than a small man in too big a place. The noted musician who has to sit hour after hour teaching a little schoolgirl the rudiments of music and how to thrum the scales must fret and groan. The greatest of English orators, like Edmund Burke, or the noblest of English writers, like John Milton, must have had many a bitter hour when they saw men of inferior talents winning the popular applause and occupying the highest governmental positions which were denied them. But better be the great orator who can charm only a few listeners rather than the poor speaker who disappoints a large throng. Better be the inspired writer in a small, neglected study, writing for the ages which are not yet born, rath er than the incompetent statesman whose official pen is plunging a nation into international strife and who is bringing misery and woe, suffering and death to hundreds and thousands of innocent homes. When the Christian believer asks of God for a Christmas present a position of earthly influence he should not ask of him a place too big, a place which by brain and body and consecration he is unable to fill. Then he may not only dishonor his Master, but disappoint all his earthly friends who love him and who would be proud of his success as they will grieve at his failure.
But as I go on making these Christmas requests there comes to me still another, which we should all be willing to make. We should come to God and say: "O God, give me these blessings if it be thy will. Then, I beseech thee, take away my position of influence as soon as I outlive my influence for good or when I am to meet temptation greater than I can bear."
When I make this plea I especially make it against the temptations of the forties and the fifties and the sixties and the seventies as well as the temptations of the twenties and the thirties. It is easy enough to pray for help to guard against the temptations of youth. But who specially prays for help to guard against the temptations stylishly and pay the way of your friends there costs money. The young man is living, as a rule, by the day. He's home and is carefully watched by parents and by elder sisters. He is, as a rule, looked after more than the world at large because he is young. But when a man becomes a merchant then comes the greatest test of temptation. When he becomes an employer instead of an employe and there is a large account to his credit in the bank, then temptations come to him with the most subtle enticements. No one but a successful minister knows how many temptations are ready to beset the successful man from the right path. No one but a successful physician or a successful lawyer knows how many forces are ready to change his office into a den of sin. No one but a successful merchant knows how easy it is to misuse his powers. When Solomon was young he was true to God. When Solomon became old he became false to the God of his fathers. O God, give to me a position of influence if it be thy will! But take away that position of influence when the temptations become too great for me to bear. Deliver me, O Father, from the temptations of middle life and of old age!
But, though the words of my text open wide the door of invitation for these Christmas requests, we must remember that the God limits them to one condition. Let me read the text to you "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name that will I do." If you are going to make these Christmas requests you must ask them in Christ's name. And can you ask them in Christ's name unless you yourself are part of Christ? Are you part of Christ? Have you surrendered your heart to him? Can it be that, with all your hopes and plans for next Christmas, you have not planned to celebrate that Christmas by becoming one with Jesus?
Ah, my friends, instead of talking about what God is going to give to you let us first for one moment talk about what you are going to give to God. You say you are young and weak and helpless. You say you do not amount to much. But, my friends, even the young is enough to have in your power the possibility of giving pleasure even to God. Do you not remember the times you were out in the country your little baby girl went and collected a few weeds and came running to you, saying: "Here, mamma, here are some flowers from baby?" Don't you remember how you caught your darling up in your arms and placed a kiss upon her lips as you said, "What, did my baby think enough of me to give me all these?" Have you not those faded weeds preserved among your precious treasures? Are they not laid alongside of the little yellow curl you cut off just before her last sickness? And tell me, if your baby, now in heaven, made you happy by the gift of a few weeds, will you make God happy by giving to him the Christmas gift of your immortal soul? "In my name—in my name." Are you ready to make your Christmas gifts in Christ's name by first giving your heart as a Christmas gift for him to keep forever? I tell you vanity there is joy in the presence of God over one sinner that repenteth. My son, my son, give me thy heart!

Willing to Oblige.
A little cockney boy from one of the back slums in London was invited, with about 30 others, to a charity dinner given at the house of a lady in fashionable society. When dinner was over the lady asked the little ones to sing or recite in turn. All went well until it came to the little cockney lad's turn, but he made no sign of starting to sing or recite until his hostess said: "Tommy, don't you hear you sing." After a moment's pause the young guest answered: "I can't, lady." "What!" said the lady. "You cannot sing? Then what can you do, Tommy?" To which Tommy replied: "Well, lady, I'll do my best. I'll fight any of the other kids in the room."

Game Dinners In the Workhouse.
The paupers in the Meriden, Enfield, workhouse have been dining on pheasants and rabbits for several days, by the generosity of local sportsmen, who sent the game to the workhouse.

STOMACH'S IMPORTANCE.
IMPERFECT DIGESTION MOST PROLIFIC CAUSE OF SERIOUS DISEASE
Few people seem to realize the real dangers in disturbed, deficient or indigestion.
While health reports do not give indigestion as a cause of death, yet it is the primary cause of all the weakness of the stomach that ever becomes fatal, such as dyspepsia, liver complaint, heart, kidney disease, nervous prostration, rheumatism, and many other diseases. At the first symptoms of indigestion, biliousness, sick headache, or sour stomach, it there is a feeling of fullness after eating, heartburn after eating, nervousness, dizziness, coated tongue, pimples on the face and limbs, specks before the eyes, a person's irritable conditions, with cold feet, and sleeplessness, a few doses of Mi-o-na will overcome indigestion.
Mi-o-na Stomach Tablets will do it in most cases, give prompt relief and permanent cure. Mi-o-na overcomes loss of appetite, the weakness of the stomach, sick headache, and all the misery caused, but we guarantee Mi-o-na will do more than this. We guarantee a written agreement with every box, or money will be refunded. You can no risk whatever in buying Mi-o-na.
Mr. Alexander Ingram says: "Your money back if not satisfied should read 50-cent box of Mi-o-na stomach tablets. I will say I am well pleased with the results. Mi-o-na is sold by druggists everywhere. Price 50 cents per box, and on receipt of price, 50 cents.
To-day to-day send for sample package, and also give us your symptoms, and know how easy it is to overcome. Our specialists will give your case due care and attention without charge. Address Stuart Medicine Co., Hoffman House Complex, Buffalo, N.Y.

DENBIGH.
Very good sleighing at present, but it has all appearance of rain again.
The community was shocked and saddened by the news which reached Denbigh of the death of Mrs. Samuel Buffan, Vennachar, near Lake Scugog, which took place on Thursday morning. Deceased was a highly respected young woman of the country, and youngest daughter of the late C. W. Stapleton. She leaves a husband and one little daughter, about three years old, a mother, sisters and some brothers to mourn. An infant daughter will be buried with the mother, who was only a few hours old when she died. The funeral will take place to-morrow, at 10 o'clock, at Vennacher Methodist church. The bereaved friends have our deepest sympathy.
Mrs. Ira Sine returned to Cloyne on Tuesday morning after a pleasant three weeks at home.

TRY THIS FOR YOUR COUGH
To relieve a cough or break up a cold in twenty-four hours, the following simple formula, the ingredients of which can be obtained of any good druggist at small cost, is all that will be required: Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure), one ounce; Virgin Oil of Pine, two ounces; good Whisky, a half pint. Shake well and take in teaspoon dose every four hours. The desired results can not be obtained unless the Virgin Oil of Pine is pure. It is therefore better to purchase the ingredients separately and prepare the mixture yourself. Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure) should be purchased in the original half-ounce vials, which druggists put up for dispensing. Each vial is securely sealed in a round wooden case to prevent breakage. Oil from exposure to light. Around the wooden case is the label, with "Virgin Oil of Pine (Pure)"—plainly printed thereon. There are many imitations and cheap productions of Pine, but they are practically worthless, hence effect the desired results. 49m

A JUDGE WHO REFORMS PARENTS AND WEDS CHILDREN.
Ben. B. Lindsey, the "just" judge of Denver, the man who saves young criminals and turns them into good citizens—the leader of boys and girls—has married the children of Denver turn when they are in trouble to Judge Ben. He is "up against" the "ring," just as every reformer is the country up against it. In the November American, McClure's, Lincoln Steffens, the crusading editor has described the fascinating work of this man, and tells the story of "the opposition."
Chester is a story for every mother and father in the country to read and ponder over, as it shows how to fight the machine; but he has also to contend with the prejudices and antagonism of "feel." Talents and incompetent men there "who haven't enough love for children to understand them, nor enough character to hold their respect." Lindsey is a judge Tuesday to work with parents is as interesting as that of his work with children.

There are good brick house and wood on the premises, and is well watered. Apply to MISS GIANT, 80 Bridge street, Belleville. 44tf

Good luck you say your prayers early, Rosie.

Young Hopeful—Ah, but you should hear me gargle!

Just the Thing.—Thirsty Wanted.—A pill that acts upon the stomach and yet is so compound that certain ingredients of it preserve their power to act upon the intestinal canals, so as to clear them of excreta, the retention of which cannot but be harmful, was long looked for by the medical profession. It was found in Parmelee's Vegetable Pills, which are the result of much expert study, and are scientifically prepared as a laxative and an alterative of no mean order.

Gregg.—Dropped into the Court House this morning and lost my overcoat there, confound the luck.

Brown—That's nothing, last week I lost a whole suit there.

Many inherit weak lungs, and as disease usually assails the weakest point, these persons are continually exposed to attacks of severe pulmonary disturbances. The speedy use of Hoyle's Anti-Consumptive Syrup will be found a preventive and a protection, strengthening the weak spots so they are not so liable to derangement from exposure or sudden atmospheric changes. Hickle's Syrup is cheap and good.

Gentlemen—Frederick, go upstairs and tell my wife to stop her singing. Toastmaster—That is not my lady, sir, it's the cook. Shall I—

Gentleman—No, for heaven's sake, don't say anything!

Great Medicine.—Tontl, one of the pioneers of French Canada, lost one hand and wore an iron hook as a substitute. He was in the habit of nourishing the cut of refractory Indians with this iron hand, and they have recognized that it was "great medicine." Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil is great medicine. It takes hold of pain like an iron hand and knocks it out of the system.

Mrs. Magrane—Your husband is the most argumentative man I know.

Mrs. Bagrane—Yes; for ten years he has been trying to convince me that he isn't.

The superiority of Mother Graves' Worm Exterminator is shown by its good effects on the children. Purchase a bottle and give it a trial.

Have you any good reason for suing for breach of promise? Did he ever show your daughter any marked attention?

"Any attent on? Why, man alive! He once gave her his seat in a trolley car!

Corns cause intolerable pain. Holloway's Corn Cure removes the trouble. Mrs. Bag.—Yes; for ten years he has been trying to convince me that he isn't.

Pearl—My dear Bertha, it is useless to beat you at every opportunity. I am getting continually. I do not see why you can't improve your game and have some success.

Sister—Sophie, I've been a fool for so long that I've got used to it.

If these scribbles only do half that is claimed for them, inside a year, we should be able to breakfast at Delmonico's in Cuba, dine in Great Britain and be back again in time to meet the morning milkman.

"Jane, don't you think that sweetheart of yours is a proper waiter? I've been waiting for a meal, mum; but he always uses a breath perfumer and it should be sure."

"No, ma'am," Harvard Hasben explained, "I'm not a common tramp. I jus' can't work. I'm what you might call 'an unhappy medium'."

"Indeed?" replied Mrs. Subbubs, surprised; "you mean you're unhappy when you're working?"

"Yessm. You see, I'm too heavy for light work and too light for heavy work."

"Whereabouts was Sam Simpson's loan hurt, Dawson?"

"He was injured in the lumbar region."

"I want to know! Tree fell on him, I s'pose."

Mother—Tommy, what did I say I'd do to you if you ever touched that jam again?

Tommy—Why, it's funny, ma, that you should forget, too, I'm blamed if I can remember!

"That, Tommy," said his mother, "didn't your conscience tell you you were doing wrong?"

"Yessm, replied Tommy, "but I don't believe everything I hear."

Mistress, trying to be agreeable—What are your favorite dishes, Bridget?

New Cook—To ate or to break, mum?

One day Percy, aged three, was playing with the tail of a big dog. "Look out," said a careful aunt; "he'll bite you, dear." "Oh, no, auntie," he said, "I've not at the bitin' end."

"Listen to this, Mavia," said Mr. Stobb as he unfolded his scientific paper, "Pyle's article states that in some of the old Roman prisons that have been unearthed they found the petrified remains of the prisoners." "Gracious, John!" replied Mrs. Stobb with a smile, "I supposed you'll be to call them hardened criminals."

HAVE YOU CATARRH ?

BREATHE HYOMEI AND GET RELIEF AND CURE. SOLD UNDER GUARANTEE.

If you have catarrh, with offensive breath, burning pains in the throat, coughing, raising of mucous, difficulty in breathing, sneezing, huskiness, discharge from the nose, ticking and dropping at the back of the throat, especially yat night, coughing spasms, etc., begin the use of Hyomei at once.

Its healing medication will give relief in a few days and its continued use will completely drive all catarrhal germs from the system.

Hyomei contains Nature's healing oils and balsams, the germ-killing properties of the pine-forests, and goes with the air you breathe to the seat of remote cells of the respiratory organs, destroying and killing all catarrhal germs and soothing and healing any irritation there may be in the mucous membrane. It is easy and pleasant to use Hyomei, pleasanter than to take it by the stomach dosing, as its healing air is breathed through a neat pocket inhaler, which can be carried in the purse or vest pocket, and carries medication to just the spot where relief is needed.

The complete Hyomei outfit costs but $1.00, extra bottles, if needed, 50 cents We do not want anyone's money unless Hyomei gives relief and cure, and we sell it on that condition that money will be refunded unless the remedy gives satisfaction.

A drugg sta should be able to supply you with Hyomei, but will send it by mail on receipt of price, and every package is sold with the distinct understanding that it costs nothing unless it cures. Write us to-day for a symptom blank, which we will send you free, together with treatise on Catarrh, and how to cure it. When you fill in and return to us the symptom blank, our consulting physician will give your case the best care and attention, and write you a letter of advice without charge. Booth's Hyomei Company, Buffalo, N.Y.

RESULTS OF BLOOD POISONING.

CURED BY ZAM-BUK — CHRONIC ULCERS AND SORES OF NINE YEARS STANDING HEALED BY THIS HERBAL BALM.

The wonderful value of Zam-Buk, the herbal balm in cases of chronic ulcers, sores, etc., is illustrated by the experience of Mrs. W. E. Rice, of Lorne Coun cil, Ont., She says:

"I cannot be too thankful enough for the day Zam-Buk came to Canada. For nine years I had been a sufferer from running sores on my legs caused by blood poisoning. I had tried every kind of ointment and salve that I had heard of, but none of them served to do more than relieve. Later on I was worse than ever, and could not bear to stand on my feet for five minutes. The pain was so acute that I would fain bear to have my legs cut off. I heard of Zam-Buk, and decided to give it a fair trial. From first commencing with it I did me good, and after using it for a few weeks I found I could get about all my own work. I have watched to see if the cure was permanent before making this statement, and now I am very glad to give my testimony. I shall be pleased to answer any inquiries and if any one cares to come and see me I will be pleased to tell them what Zam-Buk has done for me."

It is by working such cures as the above that Zam-Buk has made for itself the world-wide reputation it has certain cure for cuts, burns, bruises, sores, piles, ringworm, eczema, running sores, ulcerating rashes, scalp diseases, poisoned wounds, festering sores, boils, abscesses, bad legs, chapped hands, rigworm, eye pains, scrofula, blood poisoning, blackheads, acne, stiffness, rheumatism, and all injured, diseased or inflamed conditions of skin and tissue. Of all druggists at 50c. a box or postpaid from the Zam-Buk Co., Colborne Street, Toronto, upon receipt of price. 6 boxes for $2.50.

A FOOD AND A TONIC

What the leading Medical Journal of the world has to say about FERROL.

After making a thorough test of FERROL in its own laboratory the London (England) Lancet published an article from which the following is taken:

FERROL

"This is a successful combination of the well-known valuable remedies, Cod Liver Oil, Iron and Phosphorus. The formula is no secret, and our analysis showed the presence and amount of constituents as described. The preparation is a good one and of distinct therapeutic value. The association of an easily assimilable oil, in a fine state of division, with a phosphatic salt of iron which does not disturb the digestive functions and which is easily tolerated, determines its success as a food and tonic in wasting diseases."

What the London Lancet recommends as a food and a tonic in all wasting diseases must have very special qualities.

No higher endorsation is possible. The results following the use of FERROL for the past ten years have proved that this endorsation is well deserved.

FERROL is not a patent mystery. The formula is freely published. It is prescribed by the best Physicians. It is endorsed by the most eminent Medical Journals. It is used in prominent Hospitals, Sanitariums, etc.

THE LADIES MUSICAL.

We are indeed greatly pleased and encouraged over the interest taken in our Ladies Musical Club. Though organized but on the 22nd inst. it has a large membership of capable and willing workers and interested listeners. "Progress is what we hope for in the future. The meeting held last Saturday afternoon was given to the study of an American composer, Ethelbert Nevin. The programme, under the management of Miss Cairns, was truly indicative of the gentle and sensitive life of Nevin. The essayist, Mrs. Shibley, gave an excellent paper on his short but busy life, making mention of some of his charming and aesthetic compositions. The Club will hold its third meeting in the Town Hall, Dec. 15th, at 3.30 p.m., the day to be "Miscellaneous," in charge of Mrs. Burritt. Rec. Sec.

CURLERS MEETING.

A large and enthusiastic meeting of the Napanee Curling Club was held in the Public Library on Monday evening last.

President J. L. Boyes presided. After several reports had been read, the following officers were elected for the year 1906-7:

President—W. F. Hall.
Vice-President—J. S. Ham.
Treasurer—J. W. Robinson.
Secretary—J. Frank Chalmers.
Executive Committee—W. C. Smith, Wm. Templeton, J. L. Boyes, C. I. Maybee, W. A. Bellhouse.
Ice Committee—Dr. Leonard, W. C. Smith, C. I. Maybee.
Delegates to Central Ontario League—Dr. Leonard J. S. Ham.
Auditors—R. A. Croskery, R. G. H. Travers.
Chaplain — Revds. A. Macdonald, F. T. Dibb and T. P. O'Connor.

Messrs. Croskery, F. Boyes, Travers, Hill and Dr. Leonard were appointed a committee to consider the advisability of forming senior and junior rinks and junior league, and report.

The prospects are most encouraging for a large and enthusiastic membership this year. The new waiting room now in course of completion, will also add greatly to the comfort of the members this year.

STEPHEN H. ROBLIN.

("Daily Colonist," Victoria, B.C., Nov. 21st.)

Stephen H. Roblin died at St. Joseph's hospital, Victoria, B.C., yesterday afternoon after a short illness. Deceased was a native of Adolphustown, Lennox County, Ontario, and was 58 years of age. During the early part of his life he engaged in the dry goods business in Napanee, and in 1885 came West and has been engaged in business in this city for several years. He leaves a wife and one sister to mourn his loss. The remains were removed to the parlors of W. J. Hanna, and the funeral will take place from the family residence, No. 12 Blanchard street, tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock. Rev. E. R. Adams will conduct the services. Deceased was a son of the late Cyrus Roblin, of Adolphustown, and was well known and highly respected in Napanee, being years ago senior member of the firm of Roblin & Ford, tailors and clothiers. He leaves a brother, Mr. John N. Roblin, of Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., and sister, Mrs. H. E. Robertson, Vancouver, B.C. Also a widow, a daughter of the late Daniel McLaver, of Napanee.

Catarrh of the nose and throat should lead you to at least ask for a free trial box of Dr. Shoop's Catarrh Cure. Nothing so surely proved as a real, actual test—and Dr. Shoop, to prove this, earnestly desires that we let you make that test. This creamy, Snow White healing balm soothes the throat and nostrils, and quickly purifies a foul or offensive breath. Call and investigate, at T. F. Wallace's drug store. 49d

Brisco Opera House.

Manager Isaac Brisco has two first-class shows for next week, which should attract large crowds. Napanee has always shown an appreciation of good music, and we trust Mr. Brisco will not be disappointed next week.

THE ROYAL SCOTS CONCERT PARTY will give one of their high-class entertainments here next Monday night, 10th Dec. The Deseronto Tribune says of the company: "Victor's Theatre was filled Tuesday evening with an audience that departed well pleased with the concert given by the Royal Scots Concert Party. Every number given was encored. On her first appearance on the stage Miss Donaldson was loudly applauded and her popularity did not wane in the slightest during the evening. Her voice is sweet and her enunciation such that every word and syllable is distinct. Mr. Neill, the tenor, has a voice the equal of which has not been heard in a long while. Mr. Howard, ventriloquist and musician, is a marvel. He drinks water and smokes a cigarette the while his manikins are being made to talk and sing. His musical ability is evidenced by his command of many instruments.

VICTOR'S ROYAL VENETIAN BAND, assisted by Miss Emily Frances Scott, soprano soloist, is the attraction for Tuesday night, 11th Dec. The following is the programme

PART I.

March, "Canadian Beauties" ..... Victor
Overture, "Il Guarany" ..... Gounod

the princess could not refuse to see them. Beverly Calhoun reluctantly departed, but not until after giving a promise to accompany the Lorrys to the railway station.

* * * * * *

The trunks had gone to be checked, and the household was quieter than it had been in many days. There was an air of depression about the place that had its inception in the room upstairs where sober faced Halkins served dinner for a not overthalthative young couple.

"It will be all right, dearest," said Lorry, divining his wife's thoughts as she sat staring rather soberly straight ahead of her. "Just as soon as we get to Edelweiss the whole affair will look so simple that we can laugh at the fears of today. You see, we are a long way off just now."

"I am only afraid of what may happen before we get there, Grafton," she said simply. He leaned over and kissed her hand, smiling at the emphasis she unconsciously placed on the pronoun.

Beverly Calhoun was announced just before coffee was served and a moment later was in the room. She stopped just inside the door, clicked her little heels together and gravely brought her hand to "salute." Her eyes were sparkling and her lips trembled with suppressed excitement.

"I think I can report to you in Edelweiss next month, general," she announced, with soldierly dignity. Her hearers stared at the picturesque recruit, and Halkins so far forgot himself as to drop the silk handled cup of sugar upon the table instead of into the cup.

"Explain yourself, sergeant!" finally fell from Lorry's lips. The eyes of the princess were beginning to take on a rapturous glow.

"May I have a cup of coffee, please, sir? I've been so excited I couldn't eat a mouthful at home." She gracefully slid into the chair Halkins offered and broke into an ecstatic giggle that would have resulted in a court martial had she been serving any commander but Love.

With a plenteous supply of southern idioms she succeeded in making them understand that the major had promised to let her visit friends in the legation at St. Petersburg in April, a month or so after the departure of the Lorrys.

"He wanted to know where I'd rather spend the spring—Washington or Lexington—and I told him St. Petersburg. We had a terrific discussion, and neither of us ate a speck at dinner. Maumid is would be all right for me to go to St. Petersburg if Aunt Josephine was still of a mind to go too. You see, auntie was scared almost out of her boots when she heard there was prospect of war in Graustark, just as though a tiny little war like that could make any difference away up in Russia, hundreds of thousands of miles away"—with a scornful wave of the hand—"and then I just made auntie say she'd go to St. Petersburg in April, a whole month sooner than she expected to go in the first place, and"—

"You dear, dear Beverly!" cried Yetive, rushing joyously around the table to clasp her in her arms.

"And St. Petersburg really isn't a hundred thousand miles from Edelweiss!" cried Beverly gayly.

"It's much less than that," said Lorry, smiling. "But you surely don't expect to come to Edelweiss if we are fighting. We couldn't think of letting you do that, you know. Your mother would never"—

"My mother wasn't afraid of a much bigger war than yours can ever hope to be!" cried Beverly resentfully. "You can't stop me if I choose to visit Graustark!"

"Does your father know that you contemplate such a trip?" asked Lorry, returning her hand clasp and looking dubiously into the swimming blue eyes of his wife.

"No, he doesn't," admitted Beverly a trifle aggressively.

"He could stop you, you know," he suggested. Yetive was discreetly silent.

"But he won't know anything about it," cried Beverly triumphantly.

"I could tell him, you know," said Lorry.

"No, you couldn't do anything so mean as that," announced Beverly. "You're not that sort."

CHAPTER III.

A PONDEROUS coach lumbered slowly, almost painfully, along the narrow road that skirted the base of a mountain. It was drawn by four horses, and upon the seat sat two rough, unkempt Russians, one holding the reins, the other lying back in a lazy doze. The month was June, and all the world seemed soft and sweet and joyful. To the right flowed a turbulent mountain stream, boiling savagely with the alien waters of the flood season. Ahead of the creaking coach rode four horsemen, all heavily armed; another quartette followed some distance in the rear. At the side of the coach an officer of the Russian mounted police was riding easily, jangling his accouterments with a vigor that disheartened at least one occupant of the vehicle. The windows of the coach doors were lowered, permitting the fresh mountain air to caress fondly the face of the young woman who tried to find comfort in one of the broad seats. Since early morn she had struggled with the hardships of that seat, and the late afternoon found her very much out of patience. The opposite seat was the resting place of a substantial colored woman and a stupendous pile of bags and boxes. The boxes were continually toppling over, and the bags were forever getting under the feet of the once placid servant, whose face, quite luckily, was much too black to reflect the anger she was able otherwise, through years of practice, to conceal.

"How much farther have we to go, lieutenant?" asked the girl on the rear seat plaintively, even humbly. The man was very deliberate with his English. He had been recommended to her as the best linguist in the service at Vadderitch, and he had a reputation to sustain.

"It another hour is but yet," he managed to inform her, with a confident smile.

"Oh, dear," she sighed, "a whole hour of this!"

"We soon be dar, Miss Bev'ly. Jes' 'nother hour an' we min' to res' easy-like, an' we"— But the faithful old colored woman's advice was lost in the wrathful exclamation that accompanied another dislodgment of bags and boxes. The wheels of the coach had dropped suddenly into a deep rut. Aunt Fanny's growls were scarcely more potent than poor Miss Beverly's moans.

"It is getting worse and worse," exclaimed Aunt Fanny's mistress petulantly. "I'm black and blue from head to foot, aren't you, Aunt Fanny?"

"Ah cain' say as to de blue, Miss Bev'ly, s'Hit's a mos' monstrous bad road, sho 'nough. Stay up dar, will yo'?" she concluded, jamming a bag into an upper corner.

Miss Calhoun, tourist extraordinary, again consulted the linguist in the saddle. She knew at the outset that the quest would be hopeless, but she could think of no better way to pass the next hour than to extract a mite of information from the officer.

"Now for a good old chat," she said, beaming a smile upon the grizzled Russian. "Is there a decent hotel in the village?" she asked.

They were on the edge of the village before she succeeded in finding out all that she could, and it was not a great deal, either. She learned that the town of Balak was in Axphain, scarcely a mile from the Graustark line. There was an eating and sleeping house on the main street, and the population of the place did not exceed 300.

When Miss Beverly awoke the next morning, sore and distressed, she looked back upon the night with a horror that sleep had been kind enough to interrupt only at intervals. The wretched hostelry lived long in her secret catalogue of terrors. Her bed was not a bed; it was a torture. The room, the table, the—but it was all too odious for description. Fatigue was her only friend in that miserable hole. Aunt Fanny had slept on the floor near her mistress' cot, and it was the good old colored woman's grumbling that awoke Beverly. The sun was climbing up the mountains in the east, and there was an air of general activity about the place. Beverly's watch told her that it was past 8 o'clock.

"Good gracious!" she exclaimed, "it's nearly noon, Aunt Fanny. Hurry along here and get me up. We must leave this abominable place in ten minutes." She was up and racing about excitedly.

"Befo' breakfas'?" demanded Aunt Fanny weakly.

"Goodness, Aunt Fanny, is that all you think about?"

"Well, honey, you'll be thinkin' moughty serious 'bout breakfas' 'long to'ahds 'leben o'clock. Dat li'l tummy o' yourn'll be pow'ful mad 'cause ye didn'"—

"Very well, Aunt Fanny, you can run along and have the woman put up a breakfast for us, and we'll eat it on the road. I positively refuse to eat another mouthful in that awful dining room. I'll be down in ten minutes."

She was down in less. Sleep, no matter how hard earned, had revived her spirits materially. She pronounced herself ready for anything. There was a wholesome disdain for the rigors of the coming ride through the mountains in the way she gave orders for the start. The Russian officer met her just outside the entrance to the inn. He was less English than ever, but he eventually gave her to understand that he had secured permission to escort her as far as Ganlook, a town in Graustark not more than fifteen miles from Edelweiss and at least two days from Balak. Two competent Axphainian guides had been retained, and the party was quite ready to start. He had been warned of the presence of brigands in the wild mountainous passes north of Ganlook. The Russians could go no farther than Ganlook because of a royal edict from Edelweiss forbidding the nearer approach of armed forces. At that town, however, he was sure she easily could obtain an escort of Graustarkian soldiers.

As the big coach crawled up the mountain road and farther into the oppressive solitudes Beverly Calhoun drew from the difficult lieutenant considerable information concerning the state of affairs in Graustark. She had been eagerly awaiting the time when something definite could be learned. Before leaving St. Petersburg early in the week she was assured that a state of war did not exist. The Princess Yetive had been in Edelweiss for six weeks. A formal demand was framed soon after her return from America requiring Dawsbergen to surrender the person of Prince Gabriel to the authorities of Graustark. To this demand there was no definite response, Dawsbergen insolently requesting time in which to consider the proposition.

Meanwhile Graustark sent an envoy to Edelweiss to say that all friendly relations between the two governments would cease unless Graustark took vigorous steps to recapture the royal assassin. On one side of the unhappy principality a strong, overbearing princess was egging Graustark on to fight, while on the other side an equally aggressive people defied Yetive to come and take the fugitive if she could. There was but one alternative, and a struggle seemed inevitable. At Balak it was learned that Axphain had recently sent a final appeal to the government of Graustark, and it was no secret that something like a threat accompanied the message.

Prince Gabriel was in complete control at Serros and was disposed to laugh at the demands of his late captors. His half brother, the dethroned Prince Dantan, was still hiding in the festnesses of the hills, protected by a small company of nobles, and there was no hope that he ever could regain his crown. Gabriel's power over the army was supreme. The general public favored Dantan, but it was helpless in the face of circumstances.

"But why should Axphain seek to harass Graustark at this time?" demanded Beverly Calhoun in perplexity and wrath. "I should think the brutes would try to help her."

"There is an element of opposition to the course the government is taking," the officer informed her in his own way, "but it is greatly in the minority. The Axphainians have hated Graustark since the last war, and the princess despises this American. It is an open fact that the Duke of Mirrox made the opposition to Princess Volga, and she is sure to have him beheaded if the chance affords. He is friendly to Graustark and has been against the policy of his princess from the start."

"I'd like to hug the Duke of Mirrox," cried Beverly warmly. The officer did not understand her, but Aunt Fanny was scandalized.

"Good Lawd!" she muttered to the boxes and bags.

As the coach rolled deeper and deeper into the rock shadowed wilderness Beverly Calhoun felt an undeniable sensation of awe creeping over her. The brave, impetuous girl had plunged gayly into the project which now led her into the deadliest of uncertainties with but little thought of the consequences.

The first stage of the journey by coach had been good fun. They had passed along pleasant roads, through quaint villages and among interesting people, and progress had been rapid. The second stage had presented rather terrifying prospects, and the third day promised even greater vicissitudes. Looking from the coach windows out upon the quiet, desolate grandeur of her surroundings, poor Beverly began to appreciate how abjectly helpless and alone she was. Her companions were ugly, vicious looking men, any one of whom could inspire terror by a look. She had intrusted herself to the care of these strange creatures in the moment of inspired courage, and now she was constrained to regret the impulse. True, they had proved worthy protectors as far as they had gone, but the very possibilities that lay in their power were appalling, now that she had time to consider the situation.

The officer in charge had been recommended as a trusted servant of the czar; an American consul had secured the escort for her direct from the frontier patrol authorities. Men high in power had vouched for the integrity of the detachment, but all this was forgotten in the mighty solitude of the mountains. She was beginning to fear her escort more than she feared the brigands of the hills.

Treachery seemed printed on their backs as they rode ahead of her. The big officer was ever polite and alert, but she was ready to distrust him on the slightest excuse. These men could not help knowing that she was rich, and it was reasonable for them to suspect that she carried money and jewels with her. In her mind's eye she could picture these traitors sifting her bags and boxes in some dark pass, and then there were other horrors that almost petrified her when she allowed herself to think of them.

Here and there the travelers passed by rude cots where dwelt woodmen and mountaineers, and at long intervals a solitary Graustarkian horseman sifted aside and gave them the road. As the coach penetrated deeper into the gorge signs of human life and activity became fewer. The sun could not send his light into this shadowy tomb of granite. The rattle of the wheels and the clatter of the horses' hoofs sounded like a constant crash of thunder in the ears of the tender traveler, a dainty morsel amongst hawks and wolves.

There was an unmistakable tremor in her voice when she at last found heart to ask the officer where they were to spend the night. It was far past noon, and Aunt Fanny had suggested opening the lunch baskets. One of the guides was called back, the leader being in the dark as his charge.

"There is no village within twenty miles," he said, "and we must sleep in the pass."

Beverly's voice faltered. "Out here in all this awful"— Then she caught herself quickly. It came to her suddenly that she must not let these men see that she was apprehensive. Her voice was a trifle shrill and her eyes glistened with a strange new light as she went on, changing her tack completely:

"Day's de wust trash Ah ever did see," muttered Aunt Fanny.

"Sh! Don't let them hear you," whispered Beverly.

In spite of her terror and perplexity she was compelled to smile. It was all so like the farce comedies one sees at the theater.

As the officer rode up his face was pale in the shadowy light of the afternoon, and he was plainly very nervous.

"What is the latest news from the front?" she inquired cheerfully.

"The men refuse to ride on," he exclaimed, speaking rapidly, making it still harder for her to understand. "Our advance guard has met a party of hunters from Axphain. They insist that you —the fine lady in the coach"—are the Princess Yetive, returning from a secret visit to St. Petersburg, where you went to plead for assistance from the czar."

Beverly Calhoun gasped in astonishment. It was too incredible to believe. It was actually ludicrous. She laughed heartily. "How perfectly absurd."

"I am well aware that you are not the Princess Yetive," he continued emphatically, "but what can I do? The men won't believe me. They swear they have been tricked and are panic stricken over the situation. The hunters tell them that the Axphain authorities, fully aware of the hurried flight of the princess through these wilds, are preparing to intercept her. A large detachment of soldiers is already across the Graustark frontier. It is only a question of time before the 'red legs' will be upon them. I have ugly look. As they passed the officer one of them, pointing ahead of him with his sword, shouted savagely, "Balak!"

It was conclusive and convincing. They were deserting her.

"Oh, oh, oh! The cowards!" sobbed Beverly in rage and despair. "I must go on! Is it possible that even such men would leave"—

She was interrupted by the voice of the officer, who, raising his cap to her, commanded at the same time the driver to turn his horses and follow the escort to Balak.

"What is that?" demanded Beverly in alarm.

From far off came the sound of fire-arms. A dozen shots were fired and reverberated down through the gloomy pass ahead of the coach.

"They are fighting somewhere in the hills in front of us," answered the now frightened officer. Turning quickly, he saw the deserting horsemen halt, listen a minute and then spur their horses. He cried out sharply to the driver: "Come, there! Turn round! We have no time to lose!"

With a savage grin, the hitherto motionless driver hurried some insulting remark at the officer, who was already following his men, now in full flight down the road, and, settling himself firmly in the seat, took a firm grip of the reins, he yelled to his horses, at the same time lashing them furiously with his whip, and started the coach ahead at a fearful pace. His only thought was to get away as far as possible from the Russian officer, then deliberately desert the coach and its occupants and take to the hills.

CHAPTER IV.

THOROUGHLY mystified by the action of the driver and at length terrified by the pace that carried them careening along the narrow road, Beverly cried out to him, her voice shrill with alarm. Aunt Fanny was crouching on the floor of the coach between the seats, groaning and praying.

"Stop! Where are you going?" cried Beverly, putting her head recklessly through the window. If the man heard her he gave no evidence of the fact. His face was set forward, and he was guiding the horses with a firm, unwavering hand. The coach rattled and bounded along the dangerous way hewn in the side of the mountain. A misstep or a false turn might easily start the clumsy vehicle rolling down the declivity on the right. The convict was taking desperate chances and, with a cool, calculating brain, prepared to leap to the ground in case of accident and save himself, without a thought for the lives inside.

"Stop! Turn around!" she cried in a frenzy. "We shall be killed. Are you crazy?"

By this time they had struck a descent in the road and were rushing along at breakneck speed into oppressive shadows that bore the first impress of night. Realizing at last that her cries were falling upon purposely deaf ears, Beverly Calhoun sank back into the seat, weak and terror stricken. It was plain to her that the horses were not running away, for the man had been lashing them furiously. There was but one conclusion—he was deliberately taking her farther into the mountain fastnesses, his purpose known only to himself. A hundred terrors presented themselves to her as she lay huddled against the side of the coach, her eyes closed tightly, her tender body tossed furiously about with the sway of the vehicle. There was the fundamental fear that she would be dashed to death down the side of the mountain, but upon this she put her quick brain was evolving all sorts of possible endings—none short of absolute disaster.

Even as she prayed that something might intervene to check the mad rush and to deliver her from the horrors of the moment the raucous voice of the driver was heard, and instantly the horses and the pace became slower. The awful rocking and the jolting grew less severe, the clatter resolved itself into a broken rumble, and then the coach stopped with a mighty lurch.

Dragging herself from the corner, poor Beverly Calhoun, no longer a disdainful heroine, peered timorously out into the shadows, expecting the murderous blade of the driver to meet her as she did so. Paulof had swung from the box of the coach and was peering first into the woodland below and then upon the rocks to the left. He wore the expression of a man trapped and seeking means of escape. Suddenly he darted behind the coach, almost brushing against Beverly's hat as he passed the window. She opened her lips to call him, but even as she did so he took to his heels and raced back over the road they had traveled so precipitously.

Overcome by surprise and dismay, she only could watch the flight in silence. Less than a hundred feet from where the coach was standing he turned to the right and was lost among the rocks. Ahead, four horses, covered with sweat, were panting and heaving as if in great distress after their mad run. Aunt Fanny was still moaning and praying by turns in the bottom of the carriage. Darkness was settling down upon the pass, and objects a hundred yards away were swallowed by the gloom. There was no sound save the blowing of the tired animals and the moaning of the old negress. Beverly realized with a sinking heart that they were alone and helpless in the mountains with night upon them.

She never knew where the strength and courage came from, but she forced open the stubborn coach door and scrambled to the ground, looking frantically in all directions for a single sign of hope. In the most despairing terror she had ever experienced she started toward the lead horses, hoping against hope that at least one of her men had remained faithful.

A man stepped quietly from the inner side of the road and advanced with the uncertain tread of one who is overcome by amazement. He was a stranger and wore an odd, uncouth garb. The falling light told her that he was not one of her late protectors. She shrank back with a faint cry of alarm, ready to fly to the protecting arms of hopeless Aunt Fanny if her uncertain legs could carry her. At the same instant another ragged stranger, then two, three, four or five, appeared as if by magic, some near her, others approaching from the shadows.

"Whe—who in heaven's name are you?" she faltered. The sound of her own voice in a measure restored the courage that had been paralyzed. Unconsciously this slim sprig of southern valor threw back her shoulders and lifted her chin. If they were brigands they should not find her a cringing coward. After all, she was a Calhoun.

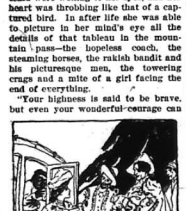
The man she had first observed stopped near the horses' heads and peered intently at her from beneath a broad and rakish hat. He was tall and appeared to be more respectably clad than his fellows, although there was not one who looked as though he possessed a complete outfit of wearing apparel.

"Poor wayfarers, may it please your highness," replied the tall vagabond, bowing low. To her surprise, he spoke in very good English. His voice was clear, and there was a tinge of polite irony in the tones. "But all people are alike in the mountains. The king and the thief, the princess and the jade live in the common fold." And his hat swung so low that it touched the ground.

"I am powerless. I only implore you to take what valuables you may find and let us proceed unharmed!" she cried eagerly, eager to have it over.

"Pray, how can your highness proceed? You have no guide, no driver, no escort," said the man mockingly. Beverly looked at him appallingly utterly without words to reply. The tears were welling to her eyes, and her heart was throbbing like that of a captured bird. In after life she was able to picture in her mind's eye all the details of that tableau in the mountain pass—the hopeless coach, the steaming horses, the rakish bandit and his picturesque men, the towering crags and a mite of a girl facing the end of everything.

"Your highness is said to be brave, but even your wonderful courage can



"Oh, you won't kill us!"

avail nothing in this instance," said the leader pleasantly. "Your escort has fled as though pursued, by something stronger than shadows; your driver has deserted; your horses are half dead; you are indeed, as you have said, powerless. And you are, besides all these, in the clutches of a band of merciless cutthroats."

"Oh," moaned Beverly, suddenly leaning against the fore wheel, her eyes almost starting from her head. The leader laughed quietly—yes, good naturedly. "Oh, you won't—you won't kill us?" she said, in a voice that to others there were smiles on the faces of all the men within the circle of light.

"Rest assured, your highness," said the leader, bowing low, his rifle barred with careless grace, "we intend no harm to you. Every man you meet in Gruastark is but a step from a trust, for your sake. We are simple hunters, and not what we may seem. It is fortunate that you have fallen into honest hands. Where is the lady in the coach?" he asked, quickly alert. A prolonged groan proved to Beverly that Aunt Fanny had secured sufficient courage to look out of the window.

"My old servant," she half whispered. Then, as several of the men started toward the door; "But she is old and wouldn't harm a fly. Please, please don't hurt her."

"Compose yourself; she is safe," said the leader. By this time it was quite dark. At a word from him two or three men lighted lanterns. The picture was more weird than ever in the fitful glow. "May I ask, your highness, how do you intend to reach Edelweiss in your present condition? You cannot manage those horses and, besides, you do not know the way."

"Aren't you going to help me?" demanded Beverly, hope springing to the surface with a joyful bound. The stranger laughed heartily and shook his head.

"Do we not look like honest men?" he cried, with a wave of his hand toward his companions. Beverly looked dubious. "We live the good, clean life of the wilderness. Outdoor life is necessary for our health. We could not live in the city," he went on, with grim humor. For the first time Beverly noticed that he wore a huge black patch over his left eye, held in place by a cord. He appeared more formidable than ever under the light of critical inspection.

"I am very much relieved," said Beverly, who was not at all relieved. "But why have you stopped us in this manner?"

"Stopped you?" cried the man with the patch. "I implore you to unsay that, your highness. Your coach was quite a standstill before we knew of its presence. You do us a grave injustice."

"It's very strange," muttered Beverly, somewhat taken aback.

"Have you observed that it is quite dark?" asked the leader, putting away his brief show of indignation.

"Dear me; so it is!" cried she, now able to think more clearly.

"And you are ladies from an inn or house of any kind," he went on. "Do you expect to stay here all night?"

"I—I'm not afraid," bravely shivered Beverly.

"It is most dangerous."

"I have a revolver," the weak little voice went on.

"Oho! What is it for?"

"To use in case of emergency."

"Such as repelling brigands who suddenly appear upon the scene?"

"Yes."

"May I ask why you did not use it this evening?"

"Because it is locked up in one of my bags—I don't know just which one—and Aunt Fanny has the key," confessed Beverly.

The chief of the "honest men" laughed again, a clear, ringing laugh that bespoke supreme confidence in his right to enjoy himself.

"And who is Aunt Fanny?" he asked, covering his patch carefully with his slouching hat.

"My servant. She's colored."

"Colored?" he asked in amazement. "What do you mean?"

"Why, she's a negress. Don't you know what a colored person is?"

"You mean she is a slave—a black slave?"

"We don't own slaves any mo'—more." He looked more puzzled than ever—then all at once he satisfy himself, walked over and peered into the coach. Aunt Fanny set up a dismal howl. An instant later Sir Hosmer was pushed aside, and Miss Calhoun was anxiously trying to comfort her old friend through the window. The man looked with a silent wonder for a minute and then strode off to where a group of his men stood talking.

"Is yo' daid yit, Miss Bevly—is de old woman daid yit?" asked Aunt Fanny. Beverly could not repress a smile.

"I am quite alive, auntie. These men will not hurt us. They are very nice gentlemen." She uttered the last observation in a loud voice, and it had its effect, for the leader came to her side with long strides.

"Convince your servant that we mean no harm, your highness," he said eagerly, a new deference in his voice and manner. "We have only the best of motives in mind. True, the hills are full of lawless fellows, and we are obliged to fight them almost daily, but you have fallen in with honest men—very nice gentlemen, I trust. Less than an hour ago we put a band of robbers to flight"—

"I heard the shooting," cried Beverly. "It was that which put my escort to flight."

"They could not have been soldiers of Gruastark, then, your highness," quite gallantly.

"They were Cossacks, or whatever you call them. But, pray, why do you call me 'your highness'?" demanded Beverly. The tall leader swept the ground with his hat once more.

"All the outside world knows the Princess Yetive—why not the humble mountain man? You will pardon me, but every man in the hills knows that you are to pass through on the way from St. Petersburg to Ganlook. We are not so far from the world, after all, or rough people of the hills. We know that your highness left St. Petersburg by rail last Sunday and took to the highway day before yesterday because the floods had washed away the bridges north of Axphain. Even the hills have eyes and ears."

Beverly listened with increasing perplexity. It was true that she had left St. Petersburg on Sunday; that the unprecedented floods had stopped all railway traffic in the hills, compelling her to travel for many miles by stage, and that the whole country was confusing her in some strange way with the Princess Yetive. The news had evidently sped through Axphain and the hills with the swiftness of fire. It would be useless to deny the story; these men would not believe her. In a flash she decided that it would be best to pose for the time being as the ruler of Gruastark. It remained to be seen how to impress upon Aunt Fanny the importance of this resolution.

"You are wise and shrewd, they must be," she said, with evasive enthusiasm. "You cannot expect me to admit, however, that I am the princess," she went on.

"It would not be just to your excellent reputation for tact if you did so, your highness," calmly spoke the man. "It is quite as well that you are not the princess as to say that you are, so what matters, after all? We reserve the right, however, to do homage to the queen who rules over these wise old hills. I offer you the humble services of myself and my companions. We are yours to command."

"I am very grateful to find that you are not brigands, believe me," said Beverly. "Pray tell me who you are, then, and you shall be sufficiently rewarded for your good intentions."

"I? Oh, your highness, I am Baldos, the goat hunter, a poor subject for reward at your hands. I may as well admit that I am a poacher and have no legal right to the property of your hills. The only reward I can ask is forgiveness for trespassing upon the property of others."

"I cannot receive pardon for all transgressions, but you must get me to some place of safety," said Beverly eagerly.

"And quickly, too, you might well have added," he said lightly. "The horses have rested, I think, so with your permission we may proceed. I know of a place where you may spend the night comfortably and be refreshed for the rough journey tomorrow."

"Tomorrow? How can I go on? I am alone!" she cried despairingly.

"Permit me to remind you that you are no longer alone. You have engaged following your highness, but it shall be a loyal one. Will you re-enter the coach? It is not far to the place I speak of, and I myself will drive you there. Come, it is getting late, and your retinue, at least, is hungry."

He flung open the coach door, and his hat swept the ground with a flourish. The light of a lantern played fitfully upon his dark, gaunt face, with its gallant smile and ominous patch. She hesitated, for entering her soul once more. He looked up quickly and saw the indecision in her eyes, the doubt appeal.

"Trust me, your highness," he said gravely, and she allowed him to hand her into the coach.

A moment later he was upon the driver's box, reins in hand. Calling out to his companions in a language strange to Beverly, he cracked the whip, and once more they were lumbering over the wretched road. Beverly sank back into the seat with a deep sigh of resignation.

"Well, I'm in for it," she thought. "It doesn't matter whether I fall into thieves or angels, I reckon I'll have to take what comes. He doesn't look very much like an angel, but he looked at me just as if he thought I were one. Dear me, I wish I were back in Washington!"

CHAPTER V.

TWO of the men walked close beside the door, one of them bearing a lantern. They conversed in low tones and in a language which Beverly could not understand. After awhile she found herself analyzing the garb and manner of the men. She was sure in herself that here were her first real specimens of Graustark peasantry, and they were to mark an ineffaceable spot in her memory. They were dark, strong faced men of medium height, with fierce black eyes and long black hair. As no two were dressed alike, it was impossible to recognize characteristic styles of attire. Some were in the rude, baggy costumes of the peasant as she had imagined him; others were dressed in the tight fitting but dilapidated uniforms of the soldiery, while several were in clothes partly European and partly oriental. There were hats and fezzes and caps, some with feathers in the bands, others without. The man nearest the coach wore the dirty gray uniform of an army officer, full of holes and rents, while another strode along in a pair of baggy yellow trousers and a dusty London dinner jacket. All in all, it was the motliest band of vagabonds she had ever seen. There were at least ten or a dozen in the party. While a few carried swords, all bore rifles and every man but one had a pistol or two in his belt. The guns appeared to be of the most modern pattern, and were in excellent condition.

"Aunt Fanny," Beverly whispered, suddenly moving to the side of the subservient servant, "where is my revolver?" It had come to her like a flash that a subsequent emergency should not find her unprepared. Aunt Fanny's jaw dropped, and her eyes were like white rings in a black screen.

"Good Lawd, wha—what fo', Miss Bevly"—

"Sh! Don't call me Miss Bev'ly. Now, just you pay 'tention to me, and I'll tell you something queer. Get my revolver right away and don't let those men see what you are doing." While Aunt Fanny's trembling fingers went in search of the firearm, Beverly outlined the situation briefly but explicitly. The old woman was not slow to understand. Her wits sharpened by fear, she grasped Beverly's instructions with astonishing alacrity.

"Yo'y well, yo' highness," she said, with fine reverence, "ah'll p'ocuah de bottle o' pepp'mint fo' yo' if yo' jes' don' mine me pullin' ar' haulin' mongst dese boxes. Mebbe yo' all 'druther hab de gingeh?" With this wonderful subterfuge as a shield she dug slyly into one of the bags and pulled forth a revolver. Under ordinary circumstances she would have been mortally afraid of the thing, but not so in this emergency. Beverly shoved the weapon into the pocket of her gray traveling jacket.

"I feel much better now, Aunt Fanny," she said, and Aunt Fanny gave a vast chuckle.

"Yass, ma'am, indeed—yo' highness," she agreed suavely.

The coach rolled along for half an hour and then stopped with a sudden jolt. An instant later the tall leader appeared at the window, his head uncovered. A man hard by held a lantern.

"Qua vandos ar deltanet, yes serest," said the leader, showing his white teeth in a triumphant smile. His exposed eye seemed to be glowing with pleasure and excitement.

"What?" murmured Beverly hopelessly. A puzzled expression came into his face; then his smile deepened and his eye took on a twinkle.

"Ah, I see," he said gayly, "your highness prefers not to speak the language of Graustark. Is it necessary for me to repeat in English?"

"I really wish you would," said Beverly, catching her breath. "Just to see if I understand correctly."

"Your every wish shall be gratified. I beg to inform you that we have reached the Inn of the Hawk and Raven. This is where we dwell last night. Tomorrow we, too, abandon the place, so our fortunes may run together for some hours at least. There is but little to offer you in the way of nourishment, and there is none of the comforts of a palace. Yet princesses can no more be choosers than beggars when the fare's in one pot. Come, your highness, let me conduct you to the guest chamber of the Inn of the Hawk and Raven."

Beverly took his hand and stepped to the ground, looking about in wonder and perplexity.

"I see no inn," she murmured apprehensively.

"Look aloft, your highness. That great black canopy is the roof; we are standing upon the floor, and the dark shadows beyond the circle of light are the walls of the Hawk and Raven. This is the largest tavern in all Graustark. Its dimensions are as wide as the world itself."

"You mean that there is no inn at all?" the girl cried in disunay.

"Alas, I must confess it. And yet there is shelter here. Come with me. Let your servant follow." He took her by the hand and led her away from the coach, a ragged lantern bearer preceding. Beverly's little right hand was rigidly clutching the revolver in her pocket. It was a capacious pocket, and the muzzle of the weapon bored defiantly into a timid powder rag that lay on the bottom. The little leather purse from which it escaped had its silver lips opened as if in a broad grin of derision, reveling in the plight of the chanois. The guide's hand was firm once but gentle, his stride bold, yet easy. His raiish hat, with its aggressive red feather, towered a full head above Beverly's Parisian violet.

"Have you no home at all—no house in which to sleep?" Beverly asked.

"I live in a castle of air," said he, waving his hand gracefully. "I sleep in the house of my fathers."

"You poor fellow," cried Beverly pityingly. He laughed and absently patted the bilt of his sword.

She heard the men behind them turning the coach into the glen through which they walked carefully. Her feet fell upon a soft, grassy sward, and the clatter of stones was now no lodger heard. They were among the shadowy trees, gaunt trunks of enormous size looming up in the light of the lanterns. Unconsciously the adventurer went over to the forest of Arden and the woodland home of Rosalind, as she had imagined it to be. Soon there came to her ears the swish of waters, as of some turbulent river hurrying by. Instinctively she drew back, and her eyes were set with alarm upon the black wall of night ahead. Yetive had spoken more than once of this wilderness. Many an unlucky traveler had been lost forever in its fastnesses.

"It is the river, your highness. There is no danger. I will not lead you into it," he said, a trifle roughly. "We are in the valley, and there are marshes yonder when the river is in its natural bed. The floods have covered the low grounds, and there is a current coming down from the hills. Here we are, your highness. This is the Inn of the Hawk and Raven."

He bowed and pointed with his hat to the smoldering fire a short distance ahead. They had turned a bend in the overhanging cliff and were very close to the retreat before she saw it. The fire was in the open air and directly in front of it deep cleft in the rocky background. Judging by the sound the river could not be more than 200 feet away. Men came up with lanterns and others piled brush upon the fire. In a very short time the scene was weirdly illuminated by the dancing flames. From her seat on the huge log Beverly was thus enabled to survey a portion of her surroundings. The overhanging ledge of rock formed a wide, deep, cragless loam, and here and there were pallets of long grass, evidently the couches of these homeless men. To the about were huge trees, and in the direction of the river the grass grew higher and then gave place to reeds. The foliage above was so dense that the moon and stars were invisible. There was a deathly stillness in the air. The very loneliness was so appalling that Beverly's poor little heart was in a quiver of dread. Aunt Fanny, who sat near by, had not spoken since leaving the coach, but her eyes were expressively active.

The tall leader stood near the fire conversing with half a dozen of his followers. Miss Calhoun's eyes finally rested upon this central figure in the strange picture. He was attired in a dark gray uniform that reminded her oddly of the dragoon choruses in the comic opera at home. The garments, while torn and soiled, were well fitting. His shoulders were broad and square, his hips narrow, his legs long and straight. There was an air of impudent grace about him that went well with his life and profession.

Surely here was a careless free lance upon whom life weighed lightly, while death "stood afar off" and despaired. The light of the fire brought his gleaming eye into bold relief, for his hat was off. Black and thick was his hair, rumpled and apparently uncared for. The face was lean, smooth and strong, with a decided nay-care cast to the corners of the mouth. Beverly found herself lamenting the fact that such an interesting face should be marred by an ugly black patch, covering, as she knew not what manner of defect. As for the rest of them, they were a grim company. Some were young and beardless, others were old and grimly, but all were active, alert and strong. The leader appeared to be the only one in the party who could speak the English language. As Beverly sat and watched his virile, mocking face and studied his graceful movements she found herself wondering how an ignorant, homeless wanderer in the hills could be so poetic and so cultured as this fellow seemed to be. Three or four men, who were unmistakably of a lower order than their companions, set about preparing a supper. Others unhitched the coach horses and led them off toward the river. Two dashing young fellows carried the seat cushions under the rocky canopy and constructed an elaborate couch for the "princess." The chief, with his own hands, soon began the construction of a small chamber in this particular corner of the cave near the opening. The walls of the chamber were formed of carriage robes and blankets, cloaks and oak branches.

The guest chamber, your highness," he said, approaching her with a wide sweep of his arm.

"It has been most interesting to watch you," she said rising.

"And it has been a delight to interest you," he responded. "You will find seclusion there, and you need see none of us until it pleases you."

She looked him fairly in the eye for a moment and then impulsively extended her hand. He clasped it warmly, but not without some show of surprise.

"I am trusting you implicitly," she said.

"The knave is glorified," was his simple rejoinder. He conducted her to the improvised bedchamber, Aunt Fanny following with loyal but uncertain tread. "I regret, your highness, that the conveniences are so few. We have no landlady except Mother Earth, no waiters, no maids, no inns in the Inn of the Hawk and Raven. This being a man's hotel, the baths are on the river front. I am having water brought to your apartments, however, but it is with deepest shame and sorrow that I confess it is as yet not here."

She laughed so heartily that his face brightened perceptibly, while the faces of his men turned in their direction as though by instinct.

"It is a typical mountain resort, then," she said. "I think I can manage very well. If you will fetch my bags to my room, sir."

"By the way, will you have dinner served in your room?" very good humoredly.

"If you don't mind, I'd like to eat in the public dining room," said she. A few minutes later Beverly was sitting upon one of her small trunks, and Aunt Fanny was laboriously brushing her dark hair.

"It's very jolly being a princess," murmured Miss Calhoun. She had bathed her face in one of the leather buckets from the coach, and the dust of the road had been brushed away by the vigorous lady in waiting.

"Yass, ma'am, Miss—yo' highness, hit's mountainous fo' yo', but wha' else is Ah goin' to sleep? Out yondah wif all dose scalawags?" said Aunt Fanny rebelliously.

"You shall have a bed in here, Aunt Fanny," said Beverly.

"Dey's de queerest lot o' tramps Ah eveh did see, an' Ah wouldn' trust 'em as fer as Ah could heave a brick house."

"But the leader is such a very courteous gentleman," remonstrated Beverly.

"Yass, ma'am; he mussa came f'm Gawgia or Kaintuck," was Aunt Fanny's sincere compliment.

The princess dined with the vagabonds that night. She sat on the log beside the tall leader and ate heartily of the broth and broiled goat meat, the grapes and the nuts, and drank of the spring water, which took the place of wine and coffee and cordial. It was a strange supper amid strange environments, but she enjoyed it as she had never before enjoyed a meal. The air was full of romance and the young girl's imagination was enthralled. Everything was so new and unreal that she scarcely could believe herself awake. The world seemed to have gone back to the days of Robin Hood and his merry men.

"You fare well at the Inn of the Hawk and Raven," she said to him, her voice tremulous with excitement. He looked mournfully at her for a moment and then smiled naively.

"It is the first substantial meal we have had in two days," he replied.

"You don't mean it!"

"Yes. We were lucky with the guns today. Pate was kind to us—and to you, for we are better prepared to entertain royalty today than at any time since I have been in the hills of Graustark."

"Then you have not always lived in Graustark?"

"No, your highness. I have lived elsewhere."

"But you were born in the principality?"

"I am a subject of its princess in heart from this day forth, but not by birth or condition. I am a native of the United States, known to you as Circumstance," and he smiled rather recklessly.

"You are a poet, a delicious poet," cried Beverly, forgetting herself in her enthusiasm.

"Perhaps that is why I am hungry and unshorn. It had not occurred to me in that light. When you are ready to retire, your highness," he said, abruptly rising, "we shall be pleased to consider the inn of the Hawk and Raven closed for the night. Having eaten, we should sleep well. We have a hard day before us. With your consent, I shall place my couch of grass near your door." I am the door-keeper. I have but to call if anything is desired."

She was tired, but she would have sat up all night rather than miss any of the strange romance that had been thrust upon her. But Sir Redfeather's suggestion savored of a command, and she reluctantly made her way to the flapping blanket that marked the entrance to the bedchamber. He drew the curtain aside, swung his hat low and muttered a soft good night.

"May your highness' dreams be pleasant ones!" he said.

"Thank you," said she, and the curtain dropped impertinently. "That was very cool of him, I must say," she added as she looked at the wavering door. When she went to sleep she never knew. She was certain that her eyes were rebellious for a long time and that she wondered how the gray dress would look after she had slept in it all night. She heard low singing as if in the distance, but after awhile the stillness became so intense that its pressure almost suffocated her. The rush of the river grew louder and louder, and there was a swishing sound that died in her ears almost as she wondered what it meant. Her last waking thoughts were of the "black patch" poet. Was he lying on the door?

She was awakened in the middle of the night by the violent flapping of her chamber window. Startled, she sat bolt upright and strained her eyes to pierce the mysterious darkness. Aunt Fanny, on her bed of grass, stirred convulsively, but did not awake. The blackness of the strange chamber was broken ever and anon by faint flashes of light from without, and she lived through long minutes of terror before it dawned upon her that a thunderstorm was brewing. The wind was rising, and the night seemed agog with excitement. Beverly crept from her couch and felt her way to the fluttering doorway. Drawing aside the blanket, she peered forth into the night, her heart jumping with terror. Her happiness was very much afraid of thunder and lightning.

The fire in the open had died down until naught remained but a few glowing embers. These were blown into brilliance by the wind, casting a ruddy red light over the scene. There was but one human figure in sight. Beside the fire stood the tall wanderer. He was hatless and coatless, and his arms were folded across his chest. Seemingly oblivious to the approach of the storm he stood staring into the heap of ashes at his feet. His face was toward her, every feature plainly distinguishable in the flaring glow from the fire. To her amazement the black patch was missing from his eye, and, what surprised her almost to the point of exclaiming aloud, there appeared to be absolutely no reason for its presence there at any time. There was no mark or blemish upon or about the eye. It was as clear and penetrating as its fellow, darkly gleaming in the red glow from below. Moreover, Beverly saw that he was strikingly handsome—a strong, manly face. The highly imaginative southern girl's mind reverted to the first portraits of Napoleon she had seen.

Suddenly he started, threw up his head and, looking up to the sky, uttered some strange words. Then he strode to the entrance of the doorway. She fe'l back breathless. He stopped just outside, and she knew that he was listening for sounds from within. After many minutes he stealthily looked forth again. He was standing near the fire, his back toward her, looking off into the night.

The wind was growing stronger. The breezes fanned the night into a rush of shivery coolness. Constant flickerings of lightning illuminated the forest, transforming the treetops into great black waves. Tall reeds along the river bank began to bend their tops, to whistle mournfully, to and from the wind. In the lowlands came from the cave will-o'-the-wisps played tag with jack-o'-lanterns, merrily scampering about in the blackness, reminding her of the revelers in a famous Brocken scene. Low moans grew out of the havoc, and voices seemed to speak in unintelligible whispers to the agitated twigs and leaves. The secrets of the wind were being spread upon the records of the night. Bileans Made Her Well

Miss E. Reed, of Kingston, Ont., has proved how to those run down, debilitated and anæmic. Bileans come as an unspeakable blessing. She says:—"I was ill, anæmic, my blood was impoverished, and I was altogether run down. In fact I did not seem to do me any good. I had pains in the chest, was nervous and miserable. I tried first one thing and then another,

Anæmia

"In every street of every Canadian town you will meet with anæmic girls and women! Look at the pale lips, the waxy complexion, the dark rings round the eyes, the spiritless carriage! Are you a sufferer? Anæmia means that the blood is deficient in red corpuscles—those minute bodies which carry oxygen and carry energy to all the organs. Bileans replenish these corpuscles. Bileans act upon stomach, liver and intestines that every bit of food you take is transformed in o nutriment. This is how they cure indigestion, cure anæmia, cure general debility. Assimilated nutriment alone can cure anæmia. Bileans ensure perfect assimilation. Prove them! Send for stamp for trial box.

but not all, are enough to give me back my lost strength. It was not until after Bileans were brought to my notice. The first few doses of this herbal remedy relieved me somewhat, and a perseverance with these soon restored me to health. Bileans are a splendid remedy, and I cannot speak too highly of them."

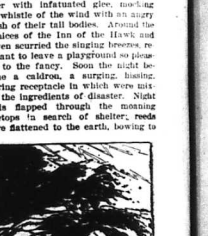
'Bileans are also a Cure for Indigestion, constipation, piles, female ailments and irregularities. Dyspepsia, sick headache, kidney disease, liver complaint, biliousness, all yield to Bileans. Send one cent to the Bileans Co., Toronto, and free sample will be mailed you. All druggists sell at 50c. a box, or post free from the Company on receipt of price if boxes for $2.50.

Beans for Biliousness



She saw him throw his arms aloft.

the sovereignty of the wind; ghosts in the midst of a million chariots, and then the sky and the earth met in one of those savage conflicts that make all other warfare seem as play.

As Beverly sank back from the crash she saw him throw his arms aloft as though inviting the elements to mass themselves and their energy upon his head. She shrieked involuntarily, and he heard the cry above the carnage. Instantly his face was turned in her direction.

"Help! Help!" she cried. He bounded toward the swishing robes and blankets, but his impulse had found a rival in the blast. Like a flash the wall of the guest chamber were whisked away, scuttling off into the night or back into the depths of the cave. With the deluge came the rain. From among the stifling robes he scrambled her up and bore her away, she knew not whither.

To be continued.

CHAPTER VI.

"MAY all storms be as pleasant as this one?" Beverly hoped as she gave one say with a merry laugh. The next instant she was placed soundly upon her feet. A blinding flash of lightning followed Rudine, the goat hunter, at her side, with a dozen shaggy figures were scrambling to their feet in all corners of the Hawk and Raven. Some one was clutching her by the dress at the knees. She did not have to look down to know that it was Aunt Fanny.

"Goodness!" gasped Beverly, and then it was pitch dark again. The men at her side called out a command in his own language and then turned his face close to hers.

"Do not be alarmed. We are quite safe now. The royal bedchamber has come to grief, however, I am sorry to say. What a fool I was not to have foreseen all this! The storm has been brewing since midnight," he was saying to her.

"Isn't it awful?" cried Beverly between a moan and a shriek.

"They are trifles after one gets used to them," he said. "I have come to be quite fond of them in the present. There are other things much more annoying, I assure your highness. We shall have lights in a moment." Even as he spoke two or three lanterns began to flicker feebly.

"Be quiet, Aunt Fanny, you are not killed at all," commanded Beverly, quite firmly.

"De house is sunh to blow down, Miss—yo' highness," groaned the trusty maidservant. Beverly laughed bravely, but nervously, with the goat hunter.

NEWBURGH.

The heaviest fall of snow of the year came this week, and the sleighing is now good.

Rev. J. Gandier, of the Presbyterian church, and Rev. Thos. Hall, pastor of the Methodist church, exchanged services last Sunday.

The Newburgh Dramatic Club got a fine reception on their appearance in Yorker last Friday evening. The hall was filled by a large and appreciative audience. The Club met with nothing but kindness at Selby and the Yorker friends, and are loud in their praises of the treatment they received. The night was quite cold for driving, and Mr. W. Chorney, our special hauler, very kindly offered fur gauntlets to any of the Club who desired them. His thoughtfulness and kindness were much appreciated, and the members of the Club are due to Mr. Courtney for his timely offer.

F. G. Millar spent Sunday at F. S. Wartman's, Napanee.

W. A. Neelds, B.A., Principal of our High School, is in Napanee this week, presiding at the Model School examinations.

A large number from the village took in the Model School at home on Napanee, last Thursday evening.

The Board of Education met on Monday evening.

Miss Caroline Finkle was reported much improved this week.

Miss Ella Chant returned on Saturday after spending a month with her brother in Webbwood, Ont.

Mrs. Jas. Dorland left on Thursday to spend the Christmas holidays with her daughter, Mrs. Mary Beacock, Toronto.

Lieut. Gilbert Beeman, of the Canadian Artillery, Kingston, is home to spend the Christmas holidays with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Beeman.

At the meeting of Court Newburgh No. 417, I. O. F., held on Tuesday evening the following officers were elected:

YARKER.

The annual tea and Xmas tree in connection with the Church of England at Yarker will be held Friday, Dec. 21st, at Dewart's hall. The children have got up a splendid programme.

The two plays given by the Newburgh Dramatic Club last week at Yarker, "The Boots at the Swan" and "My Lord in Livery", were excellent, and reflect great credit on all who took part in them. Both plays were splendidly played. The musical items on the programme by Prof. Albert Benjamin made a first rate chairman and voiced in a neat speech the thanks of the guild of St. Anthony's church to the Newburgh Dramatic Club. Proceeds, about $60.00.

REDFORD DORLAND.

Of Adolphustown Township, died at Dorland, on Thursday last, 6th Dec., aged fifty-six years. Deceased had been ill for about six weeks previous to his death. He was unmarried and leaves a widowed sister, Mrs. John P. Dorland, a brother, Mr. James Dorland, and two sisters, Mrs. J. N. Herrington, Adolphustown, and Mrs. Chas. B. Parks, Hay Bay.

Deceased was a quiet, unassuming man and an affectionate son and brother. He took a deep interest in the welfare of his native township and served for three years in the municipal council, and for the past nineteen years performed the duties of township clerk conscientiously and to the satisfaction of the councillors and ratepayers.

Mr. Dorland was an adherent of the Methodist church, and the funeral service was conducted by Rev. Mr. Sir by and was suitably responded to by the groom and grandmother and Mr. W. H. Boyle, brother-in-law of the bride. The bride received a very handsome and valuable collection of gifts, some coming from Manitoba and California, which testify very strongly of the popularity of the young couple. The groom's gifts to the bride were a handsome gold watch and chain, set of pearls; to the bridesmaid, a gold belt pin; to the groomsman, a gold locket. The happy couple left on the afternoon express west, and purpose visiting Toronto, Chicago and Detroit. They engage and other cities on their way to the Pacific coast, where they will spend the winter. While in Los Angeles they will be the guests of Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Edgar Mr. Edgar is a well known capitalist, and filling an important position in that city, and a brother of the groom. The bride is a sister of Mrs. W. H. Boyle and Mrs. Dr. Bellamy, and Mrs. Babcroft, and Miss B. Embury, M.D., of Napanee. She is a daughter of one of the most influential farmers of the west, and is very highly spoken of by all who know her. Yours, and will be at home to their many friends after June 8th, 1907.

GRETNA.

The young people here are commencing to practise for the annual Xmas tree to be held in the church on Xmas eve.

We are pleased to hear that Mr. Spafford has got a good position as overseer for appendicitis, at Kingston Hospital, on The Hay, in the city.

Mrs. Ola VanAlstine, our popular assistant teacher, has accepted a school at Enterprise. But as her home is at present right here she has won the esteem of both parents and pupils. Whether or not she will be the many regrets.

Miss Nella Mellow, who has been ill for some time, is improving nicely, under the care of Dr. Leonard.

Miss Ola VanAlstine spent Tuesday evening at Mr. and Mrs. J. Cuthbert's.

A Friend Told Me About
Bu-Ju
THE GENTLE KIDNEY CURE

Hundreds of people, who have been cured of Kidney Trouble by Bu-Ju, were first induced to try this wonderful remedy by friends who had themselves been cured. The sales of Bu-Ju are daily increasing, because everyone who takes them is benefitted—and these in turn, tell others. So the good news is spread.

Here is what a Picton man says about Bu-Ju:—

"I have used Bu-Ju with great benefit to myself, and cheerfully recommend to all who, I think, are suffering from Kidney Troubles and Rheumatism.

I think Bu-Ju the best remedy made."

Yours sincerely,
JAMES MILLS.

They Hit Spot.
The Seat of Women's Troubles.

When you get all run-down, feel tired and out of sorts, it is pretty hard to tell just what part of your peculiar organism is going wrong, isn't it? That is why you can take so much medicine and still have it do you so little good.

It doesn't hit the right spot, that is, it doesn't reach the organ or organs that are going wrong.

But supposing you could get a remedy that contains ingredients for every organ of your system, and especially those peculiar to your sex, you wouldn't need to know what is the matter with you, or just what organ is causing the trouble, would you?

Certainly not, because no matter which organ or organs it might be, they would be reached by some one of the many ingredients of the medicine, and would be restored to normal condition. And then you would be well again.

And do you know there is one just such remedy? It is

Dr. Hugo's Health Tablets for Women.

Dr. Hugo's remedy contains something for every organ of the female system; something for the stomach to help indigestion—for the bowels to cure constipation—for the nervous system to tone up the nerves—for the liver and kidneys to make them active in carrying off impurities—something for the uterine system to stop all drains, allay inflammation and make women regular.

Is there is anything wrong with you—if you don't feel as well as you used to—these tablets will give you the old time life and vigor.

Don't wait till something serious develops. Take them now.

WORRY—THE DISEASE OF THE AGE.

A famous English writer, Dr. C. W. Saleeby, contributes to Pearson's a series of articles written in a popular vein, and entitled "The Conquest of Worry." The first of these appears in the Christmas number of The Pearson's Magazine. It has many other attractive and seasonable features. One of the most remarkable things about the magazine this month is the front cover drawing by J. J. Grand. It is entitled "Our Lady of the Snows," and a new and pleasing conception of this well-worn subject. Other features of the Christmas Canadian Magazine are "Jerusalem and Its Environments" illustrated; "Old Christmas Customs in England" illustrated; reproductions of R. Caton Woodville's famous drawings, "The Dawn of Modern Day," and "His Grand Saving the Day," end of Jew Brodie's painting "The Communicants." There are several other interesting articles, with short stories by W. A. Fraser, Alice Jones, and E. P. Bindley.

Weak Kidneys

Weak Kidneys, surely point to weak Kidney Nerves. The Kidneys, like the heart, and the stomach, find their weakness, not in the organ itself, but in the nerves that control and guide and strengthen them. Dr. Shoop's Restorative is a medicine specifically prepared to reach these controlling nerves. To doctor the Kidneys alone, is a fruitless task. It is a waste of time, and of money as well.

If your back aches or is weak, if the urine voids, or is dark and strong, if you have symptoms of frights or other distressing or dangerous kidney disease, try Dr. Shoop's Restorative a month—tablets or Liquid—and see what it can and will do for you. Druggist recommend and sell

Beverly of Graustark

By Geo. Barr McCutcheon,
Author of "Graustark."

He at once set about making his guest comfortable and secure from the effects of the tempest, which was now at its height. Her couch of cushions was dragged far back into the cavern and the rescued blankets, though drenched, again became a screen.

"Do you imagine that I'm going in there while this storm rages?" Beverly demanded as the work progressed.

"Are you not afraid of lightning? Most young women are."

"That's the trouble. I am afraid of it. I'd much rather stay out here where there is cognpany. You don't mind, do you?"

"Paradise cannot be spurned by one who now feels its warmth for the first time," he said gallantly. "Your fear is my delight. Pray sit upon our throne. It was once a humble carriage pall of leather, but now it is a throne. Besides, it is much more comfortable than some of the gilded chairs we hear about."

"You are given to irony, I fear," she said, observing a peculiar smile on his lips.

"I crave pardon, your highness," he said humbly. "The heart of the goat hunter is more gentle than his wit. I shall not again forget that you are a princess and I the veriest beggar."

"I didn't mean to hurt you!" she cried in consternation, for she was a very poor example of what a princess is supposed to be.

"There is no wound, your highness," he quickly said. With a mocking grace that almost angered her he dropped to his knee and motioned for her to be seated. She sat down suddenly, clapping her hands to her ears and shutting her eyes tightly. The crash of thunder that came at that instant was the most fearful of all, and it was a full minute before she dared to lift her lids again. He was standing before her, and there was genuine compassion in his face. "It's terrible," he said. "Never before have I seen such a storm. Have courage, your highness. It can last but little longer."

"Goodness!" said the real American girl, for want of something more expressive.

Your servant has crept into your couch, I fear. Shall I sit here at your feet? Perhaps you may feel a small sense of security if I—"

"Indeed, I want you to sit there," she cried. He forthwith threw himself upon the floor of the cave, a graceful, respectful guardian. Minutes went by without a word from either. The noise of the storm made it impossible to speak and be heard. She sattered about the cavern were his outstretched followers, doubtless asleep once more in all this turmoil. With the first lull in the storm he had lamments Beverly gave utterance to the thought that long had been struggling for release.

"Why do you wear that horrid black patch over your eye?" she asked, a trifle timidly. He muttered a sharp exclamation and clapped his hand to his eye. For the first time since the beginning of their strange acquaintanceship Beverly observed downright confusion in this debonair knight of the wilds.

"It has—has slipped off," he stammered, with a guilty grin. His merry insolence was gone, his composure with it. Beverly laughed with keen enjoyment over the discomfiture of the shame faced vagabond.

"You can't fool me!" she exclaimed, shaking her finger at him in the most unconventional way. "It was intended to be a disguise. There is absolutely nothing the matter with your eye."

He was speechless for a moment, recovering himself. Wisdom is conceived in silence, and he knew this. Vagabond or gentleman, he was a clever actor.

"The eye is weak, your highness, and I cover it in the daytime to protect it from the sunlight," he said coolly.

"That's all very nice, but it looks to be quite as good as the other. And what is more, sir, you are not putting the patch over the same eye that were in when I first saw you. It was the left eye at sunset. Does the trouble transfer after dark?"

He broke into an honest laugh and heartily moved the black patch across his nose to the left eye.

"I was turned around in the darkness, that's all," he said serenely. "It belongs over the left eye, and I am deeply grateful to you for discovering the error."

"I don't see any especial reason why you should wear it after dark, do you? There is no sunlight, I'm sure,"

"I am dazzled, nevertheless," he retorted.

"Fiddlesticks!" she said. "This is a cave, not a drawing room."

"In other words, I am a lout and not a courtier," he smiled. "Well, a lout may look at a princess, but he is not expert etiquette in the hills, I am sorry to say."

"That was very unkind, even though you said it humorously," she protested. "You have called this pall a throne. Let us also imagine that you are a courtier."

"You gratify me most gently, your highness. I shall not forget my manners again, believe me." He seemed thoroughly subdued.

"Then I shall expect you to remove that horrid black thing. It is positively villainous. You look much better without it."

"Is it an edict or a compliment?" he asked, with such deep gravity that she flushed.

"It is neither," she answered. "You don't have to take it off unless you want to"—

"In either event it is off. You were right. It serves as a partial disguise. I have many enemies and the black patch is a very good friend."

"How perfectly lovely," cried Beverly. "Tell me all about it. I adore stories about feuds and all that."

"Your husband is an American. He should be able to keep you well entertained with blood-and-thunder stories," said he.

"My hus— What do you— Oh, yes!" gasped Beverly. "To be sure. I didn't hear you, I guess. That was rather a severe clap of thunder, wasn't it?"

"Is that also a command?"

"What do you mean?"

"There was no thunderclap, you know"—

"Oh, wasn't there?" helplessly.

"The storm is quite past. There is still a dash of rain in the air, and the wind may be dying hard, but aside from that I think the noise is quite subdued."

"I believe you are right. How dudden it all was."

"There are several hours between this and dawn, your highness, and you should try to get a little more sleep. Your cushions are dry and"—

"Very well, since you are so eager to get rid of"— began Beverly, and then stopped, for it did not sound particularly regal. "I should have said, you are very thoughtful. You will call me if I sleep late?"

"We shall start early, with your permission. It is forty miles to Ganlook, and we must be half way there by nightfall."

"Must we spend another night like this?" cried Beverly dolefully.

"Alas, I fear you must endure us another night. I am afraid, however, we shall not find quarters as comfortable as those of the Hawk and Raven."

"I didn't mean to be ungrateful and er—ungrippish," she said, wondering if he knew the meaning of the word.

"No?" he said politely, and she knew he did not, whereupon she felt distinctly humbled.

"You know you speak such excellent English," she said irrelevantly.

He bowed low. As he straightened his figure, to his amazement, he beheld an agonizing look of horror on her face, her eyes riveted on the mouth of the cavern. Then there came an angrier sound, unlike any that had gone before in that night of turmoil.

"Look there! Quick!"

The cry of terror from the girl's palsied lips as she pointed to something behind him awoke the mountain man to instant action. Instinctively he snatched his long dagger from its sheath and turned quickly. Not twenty feet from them a huge cattlike beast stood half crouched on the edge of the darkness, his long tail switching angrily. The feeble light from the depth of the cavern threw the wild water soaked visitor into bold relief against the black wall beyond. Apparently he was as much surprised as the two who glared at him, as though frozen to the spot. A snarling whine, a fierce growl, indicated his fury at finding his shelter, his lair, occupied.

"My God! A mountain lion! Ravone! Franz! To me!" he cried hoarsely, and sprang before her shouting loudly to the sleepers.

A score of men, half awake, grasped their weapons and struggled to their feet in answer to his call. The lion's gaunt body shot through the air. In two bounds he was upon the goat hunter. Baldos stood squarely and firmly to meet the rush of the maddened beast, his long dagger poised for the death dealing blow.

"Run!" he shouted to her.

ARMOUR LIMITED - Toronto

CANADIAN FACTORY—17 FRONT STREET EAST

Beverly Calhorn had fighting blood in her veins. Utterly unconscious of her action at the time, she quickly drew the little silver handled revolver from the pocket of her gown. As man, beast and knife came together, in her excitement she fired recklessly at the combatants, without any thought of the imminent danger of killing her protector. There was a wild scream of pain from the wounded beast, more pistol shots, fierce yells from the excited hunters, the rush of feet, and then the terrified and almost frantic girl staggered and fell against the rocky wall. Her wide gray eyes were fastened upon the writhing lion, and the smoking pistol was tightly clutched in her hand.

It had all occurred in such an incredibly short space of time that she could not yet realize what had happened.

Her heart and brain seemed paralyzed, her limbs stiff and immovable. Like the dizzy whirl of a kaleidoscope, the picture before her resolved itself into shape.

The beast was gasping his last upon the rocky floor, the hilt of the goat hunter's dagger protruding from his side. Baldos, supported by two of his men, stood above the savage victim, his legs covered with blood. The cave was full of smoke and the smell of powder. Out of the haze she began to see the light of understanding. Baldos alone was injured. He had stood between her and the rush of the lion, and he had saved her at a cost she knew not how great.

"Oh, the blood!" she cried hoarsely. "Is it—is it—are you badly hurt?" She was at his side, the pistol falling from her nervous fingers.

"Don't come near me. I'm all right!" he cried quickly.

"Take care—your dress"—

"Oh, I'm so glad to hear you speak! Never mind the dress! You are torn to pieces! You must be frightfully hurt. Oh, isn't it terrible—horrible! Aunt Fanny! Come here this minute!"

Forgetting the beast and throwing off the paralysis of fear, she pushed one of the men away and grasped the arm of the injured man. He winced perceptibly, and she felt something warm and sticky on her hands. She knew it was blood, but it was not in her to shrink at a moment like this.

"Your arm too!" she gasped. He smiled, although his face was white with pain. "How brave you were! You might have been—I'll never forget it—never! Don't stand there, Aunt Fanny! Quick! Get those cushions for him. He's hurt."

In her excitement she fired recklessly.

"Good Lawd!" was all the old woman could say, but she obeyed her mistress.

"It was easier than it looked, your highness," murmured Baldos. "Lock your arm. The knife went to his heart. I am merely scratched. His leap was short, but he caught me above the knee with his claws. Alas, your highness, these trousers of mine were bad enough before, but now they are in shreds. What patching I shall have to do! And you may well imagine I was short of thread and needles and thimbles."

"Don't jest, for heaven's sake! Don't talk like that. Here! Lie down upon these cushions and"—

"Never! Desecrate the couch of Graustark's ruler? I, the goat hunter? Bavone to dress these trifling wounds, your highness. He may not be as gentle, but he is as firm as any princess in all the world."

"Put your arm?" she cried. "Didn't you say it was your legs? Your arm is covered with blood too. Oh, dear me, I'm afraid you are frightfully wounded."

"A stray bullet from one of my men struck me there, I think. You know there was but little time for aiming"—

"Wait! Let me think a minute! Good heavens!" she exclaimed, with a start. Her eyes were suddenly filled with tears, and there was a break in her voice. "I shot you! Don't deny it —don't! It is the right arm, and your men could not have hit it from where they stood. Oh, oh, oh!"

Baldos smiled as he bared his arm. "Your aim was good," he admitted. "Had not my hasty movement been in the line's heart your bullet would have gone there. It is my misfortune that my arm was in the way. Behold, it is but a scratch. It has only cut through the skin, and a little below, perhaps. It will be well in a day or two. I am sure your will find your bullet in the carcass of our lamented friend, the probable owner of this place."

Bavone, a hungry looking youth, took charge of the wounded leader, while her highness retreated to the farthest corner of the cavern. There she sat and trembled while the wounds were being dressed. Aunt Fanny bustled back and forth, first unceremoniously pushing her way through the circle of men to take observations and then reporting to the impatient girl. The storm had passed, and the day was still except for the rush of the river. Raindrops fell now and then from the trees, glistening like diamonds as they touched the light from the cavern's mouth. It was all very dreary, uncanny and oppressive to poor Beverly. Now and then she would shudder, becoming more out of shame and humiliation than in sadness, for had she not shot the man who stepped between her and death? What must he think of her?

"He says yo' all 'd bettah go to bald, Miss Bev—yo' highness," said Aunt Fanny after one of her trips.

"Oh, he does, does he?" sniffed Beverly. "I'll go to bed when I please. Tell him so. No, no—don't do it, Aunt Fanny. Tell him I'll go to bed when I'm sure he is quite comfortable, not before."

MOUNT PLEASANT.

Our thaw has caught a cold, and we are having very cold weather. A few inches of snow fell on Thursday, and the merry jingle of sleigh bells is heard.

Mr. Hayward Compton, Deseronto, spent Sunday under the parental roof.

Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Bell, Napanee, spent Sunday at their son's, Mr. H. Bell.

A pleasant but cold evening favored the people of Mount Pleasant on Tuesday evening, the date of their entertainment. It was a success financially, and all others present. The programme was well rendered, but special mention might be made of Miss Ida Lloyd, who presided at the duties of accompanist so ably for the several selections of music. Proceeds in the neighborhood of $60.00.

THE CARE OF THE SKIN.

"A beautiful body presupposes a healthy body, in perfect condition for its use, embracing right habits, education and intelligence," says Dr. Anne Mc. Millan, in Good Housekeeping Investor. "The adage, 'Beauty is but skin deep,' like many another, is untrue. The beauty of the skin is evidence of good respiration, good digestion, proper excretion by the bowels, skin and kidneys, good circulation of the blood, and plenty of outdoor exercise.

"The skin is a very delicate and complex organ, and upon its conditions are the wholesomes to which it is exposed the health of some hundreds of upon any other agency in the over which we have control. The skin is for an independent organ, nothing in the body is independent. It is now well known that the skin, as well as other parts of the body, depends for its integrity upon the general nervous system. Disturbance anywhere in the body acts upon the skin; conversely, any disturbance in the skin acts upon the central nervous system."

THE ROBINSON CO. LIMITED

Store Open all Next Week Until 9 p.m.

Saturday Night, Dec. 22d, and Monday Night, Dec. 24th, until 10 p.m.

Only eight more shopping days till Christmas and so much to be done. There are thousands who have hardly commenced to do their Christmas shopping. Now in order to give you a chance we are going to extend the shopping hours for this one week—but we will only have part of our staff back each evening, thus relieving them from the very hard strain.

Now we ask you to help us. Come as early in the morning as you can, commence your shopping early—you will find we can serve you far better then, than later in the day when the rush comes.

Men's Neckwear---Beautiful Christmas Gifts.

Each December brings larger demand for Men's Neckwear—until the December sales are the largest of the year. Gifts—nothing could be more givable. To meet the great holiday demand we have shifted our stocks around and now ten large tables in the centre of our Men's Store are devoted to the display of our Men's Neckwear, Hosiery, Shirts, etc.

We have the sole agency in Napanee for the largest manufacturers of neckwear in Canada, "The Crescent Manufacturing Co." So great a range of Christmas neckwear as they are showing was never attempted in Canada before, and their sales have been so great that they found it necessary to stop selling and call in all their travellers from the road the 15th of October, as they had sold all they could possibly make before Christmas.

We have just received our purchase and we can truthfully say "there is no other stock of men's neckwear that can touch it." Come and see for yourself.

Remember the whole main part of our Men's Store is devoted to a display of the beautiful things in men's wear. All the better lines are practically exclusive, mostly only one or two of a kind. For instance in our 50 cent neckwear there are never more than two ties of the same pattern or shading. We cannot give you an idea of the immense assortment. Come and see.

Let Everybody Come---Bring the Children

Napanee's Biggest and Brightest Christmas Store.

Women's Suits at Three-quarter Price

It has reached the time in season when every Suit must move on. Quantities and choice have shrunken, but if we have the size you want, your lucky. Twenty-five per cent. off every woman's suit in stock. That means

$6.25 off $25.00 Suits,
$5.00 off $20.00 Suits,

Every Woman's Tailored Suit we have subject to the cut.

They can be worn under fur coats for extra warmth, and anyone of them right in line for spring wear.

Xmas Suggestions Conveniently Displayed

In anticipation of holiday crowds we have concentrated the Neckwear, Handkerchief and Novelty Stocks into main aisle displays, that are convenient to choose from. Interior displays offer many suggestions. We consider that our interior decorations this year are the finest we have had. Let us have your verdict.

Hints for Christmas Gifts.

It may save you hours to read these lists, blocks of walking and much fatigue. The before handed man or woman makes a list of those to be remembered at Xmas, writes a suggestive gift by each name, and gets the shopping done in a jiffy; sees most; has best choice, and sits back to laugh at the eleventh hour shopper. We wish everybody could have first pick. But that charm is for early comers only. Read the lists:

To our esteemed friend; Mr. C. A. Jones, Tamworth.

My dear Sir,—We, the members of the Bible class of St. Andrew's church, Tamworth, and friends, feeling the deepest regret at your departure from our midst, take this opportunity of presenting you with this small token of our esteem. We have all listened Sabbath after Sabbath to your earnest teaching of the scripture in the Bible class, and can bear testimony to the kindly christian like way in which you have at all times mingled with us. In view of this we entertain toward you feelings of sincere gratitude, kindness and desiring that you should take with you some slight memento of our association together of the bible class in St. Andrew's Presbyterian church, Tamworth.

We now ask your acceptance of this Bible and hymnal, the truths of which you have been wont to Sabbath after Sabbath to impress upon us. Trusting you may find a field of labor congenial to your feelings, and that good may in future degree follow your effort, is the prayer of each and all of us.

We wish also to express our best wishes for your son, Sinclair, who also has been faithful to duty, as the secretary of the Sabbath school. We wish for you both every prosperity in life, believe Mrs. Jones and the other members of your family.

We may not all meet again in this world of sin, but all hope to meet you in the bright forever, to which you have been so faithfully endeavoring to guide us. Signed on behalf of the class,

Mrs. Wm. Brown,
Mrs. Daniel Gilmore,
Miss Margaret Gilmore.

GREAT LENGTH OF DAYS

PROMISED TO THEM TO WHO HONOR FATHER AND MOTHER.

GROW OLD WITH GAY HEART

Righteous Old Age Desirable—Sane Men Wish to Live as Long as They Can Be a Blessing and a Beneficent Influence to Their Fellow Men—Good Effect Upon Physique of Young People Follows Obedience.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1906, by Frederick Dyer, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., Dec. 9.—In this sermon the preacher shows the pleasures that attend a life rightly spent and the blessings also, including that of longevity. The text is Exodus xx, 12, "Honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long."

Would you like to grow old? Would you live upon this earth so long that your hair shall become white as the driven snow? Would you, if you could, live to see your children grow up and the family scatter and most of the rooms of the old homestead become empty and silent except when your children's children come to make their grandfather an annual visit and play in the nursery with some of the same old toys which their fathers and mothers used when they were children? Would you be born in the latter part of one century and live on and on until you could stand at the cradle of a new century and then live on until you could see that century cast aside its swaddling clothes and pass through the days of its youth into the young manhood and come on toward its mission of middle life? In other words, would you like to live out the full allotment of a man's life and see the sun rise and set when you have reached your three-score and ten, or even pass your four-score, or even live on, as did Ludovico, the famous statesman who started to write the memoirs of his times at the great age of 115?

Would you like to be an old man, like Peter Cooper or Titian or Fenwick or Cato or Jacob or Isaac or Abraham? "Well," you say, "that all depends upon circumstances. If I could flourish in a righteous old age, like the psalmist's palm tree; if I could grow old with a young heart; if my influence for good grew as my men might be stronger when I became grayer, I would like to live to be very old, and the older the better. But if I am to be like an old worn-eaten tree, gnarled and twisted out of shape; if I am to be in infirm, tired, weak, fault-finding, helpless old man, out of touch with all the advancements of the times I want to die before I become a pest to everybody and a dead weight upon my friends. In other words, if I am going to be one of those lovable, gentle, helpful, kindly old men who lighten the burdens of all those with whom they come in contact, then I wish to live. But if I cannot be such a one then I want to die, and perhaps the sooner I die the better it will be for the happiness of those about me." Well said, my brother! We are here, of course, speaking of a glorious old age of Christian usefulness. No sane man should want to live to be a bad old man any more than he should wish to be a bad young man or a bad middle aged man, but most of us want to live just as long as we can be of use to our fellow men. Therefore the longer we can be of use the longer we should wish to live.

Who would want to die at fifty years of age if he could live to do his best work for Christ in his sixties and seventies, as did John Wesley? So wonderfully did that great man's physical frame retain its vigor that it grew stronger as it became older. In his biography we find that it was not until John Wesley reached his sixty-ninth year that he could be persuaded to travel in a carriage. He always made his preaching tours up to that time on horseback. At Kingswood he preached under the shade at this which he had planted. When he was seventy years of age he spoke at one time to over 20,000 people, all of whom could hear distinctly heard. He tells us himself that when he was seventy-two years of age his eyes were more piercing and his nerves were firmer than they were when he was forty. Yes, we should want to do our work in the sixties and thirties and forties. But we should also wish to live to do a noble Christian man's work in our fifties and sixties and seventies and, if possible, in our eighties and nineties. No man should desire to shorten his earthly usefulness one day or one hour when he is still able to serve his Divine Master and King.

Would you serve God many days? Would you serve him as an old man?

Well, if you thus desire, I can tell you how you can do it. How? Why, read the commandment of my text. God here states a simple plain specific truth. He comes to us clear and practically says this: "Boys and girls, young men and young women, if you would serve me upon earth for many years and years to come, then carefully follow the advice of your Christian parents. If you would be a long-lived man on earth a better friend than a noble Christian mother or a noble Christian father. Most of us are ready to say that God chose well for us when he let us be born in the homes of our Christian parents. Now comes the practical question, which I am putting to every young man and every young woman: Can you honor your father and thy mother that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee?"

This fifth commandment, in the first place, is emphatically true in reference to our young people's life assurance for a long future life. It is very important to talk about "the beauty of holiness" and the necessity of a healthy, pure moral character aright. It is well enough to plan for the higher attainments in the intellectual life. But we should want to grow up to be a mere healthy physical animal, but we must remember that, no matter how great the brain's power and the spiritual opportunities which are opening up before us, they are all to a great less extent dependent upon the strength of our lungs and hearts and stomachs and muscles and nerves in them. It is very important that the ship have the right kind of masts and sails and steering gear and engine appropriate and a supply, but it is also of vital importance that the vessel have the right kind of hull. The work of my brain and my spiritual opportunities may be the cargo of my journey of life, but my physical body is the hull by which I shall be able to sail on the sea of time. If that fails me, then I must die. Yet how many young people there are to-day who are laying the foundation of a future life of invalidism or of an early death by not heeding the advice of their parents in reference to the care of their physical bodies!

Oh, the tragedy of the sunken unborn frame! How they call a halt to mighty careers of earthly influence! Would you like to know what is the saddest sight to me? It is not to see a baby die. It is not to see an old man die. It is not to see a young man to be his, and see the death sweat upon that young man's brow or upon that young woman's face, upon the invalid's coverlet and know that he has wasted his physical strength, that he has put a pleasure or at the student's desk and know that his physical health is being undermined book. There is hardly a tragedy like it. Many years ago the rate of speed of the good ship Sarmiento, bound for California. Nearly all the ship's water supply was exhausted. Two vessels were many miners seeking the western gold-fields. They could not afford to quench the thirst of hundreds. At that time the vessel was a thousand miles from the nearest port of fresh water river, where fresh water could be obtained. The remaining casks were brought on deck and a guard placed over them by day and night that the water might not be wasted. The children of a party to whom water was given to each man daily—no more, no less. Slowly the ship sailed on. Then the children's fever burned, and the passengers were almost mad.

One day a man said to a party of men, among whom stood a young fellow who afterward gave me the incident: "I am dying of thirst. I must have some water. I will give a dollar to any one who will give me a drink." A pint of water, to drink." No answer. No one moved. "I will give $5 to any one who will give me a drink." No answer. No one moved. Then he took a twenty dollar gold piece out of his pocket and said: "I am dying of thirst. I must have water. I will give $20 to any one who will give me just a little water to drink." No answer. No one moved. Then, with an oath, he threw the gold coin upon the deck and said: "What is the good of it? It will not buy me even one little drink." You say that is tragic? Yes, but it is not nearly so tragic to me as to see boys and girls squandering their health and vital energies in disregard to the advice of their parents in reference to their physical health. Then, oh, the tragedy when they ought really to begin to live they are about to die. Then they come forth with the cry of despair, of death or of helpless invalidism and say: "Here, Lord, is my money; here is my time. Give me back my health." "No," says God. "No. No. I commanded thee to obey thy father and mother. They told you that you should care for your body. You have refused to follow their advice. You must die." Then, young friends, will you honor your father and your mother by heeding their warnings in your days of youth, long upon the land which the Lord, thy God, giveth you?

The most important step for young people to heed in order that a long earthly life may be theirs is to give their parents implicit confidence in reference to the companions whom they are making their friends. Parents know that bad men only introduce these friends to your fathers and mothers, but you should not. Bad men and bad women, by nature and by years, should tell your parents their names. Is it not so with you? Do you tell your parents the names of your friends? Do you tell your parents where you have been? Do you tell your parents what you have been doing? Do you tell your parents what you intend to do? Do they love best to? Most of you, I presume, do. Then, if people your parents wish you to go with and no others, a pure life, a pure soul, and a pure life are the sure result in yours. Furthermore, mark me also in this, if a son of Christian parents will persist in associating with evil companions whom his father and mother disapprove of, his father and mother will keep still more closely to him, and will pray still more fervently for him. God in a physical and a spiritual sense will bless that son who will not associate with those whom his parents disapprove of.

Will you, my fleeting energies and say: "I am to the work of a giant!" Then, my friend, if you are ready to seek some of the noblest achievements that are now placing before you, if you are ready to struggle for the necessary preparation, if you will choose a Christian lawyer or doctor or minister or successful merchant as the model you are to pattern after, if your heretic elements of a long earthly life shall be yours. The true development of the mind and the true development of the spirit are two of the most rational incentives for a long physical existence.

Are all their parental pleadings, all their prayers, all their advice, to go for naught? Do you not realize that the very moments you begin to practice your mother's virtues your physical body as well as your brain and soul will experience a complete reformation and recreation and that you will renew your youth and true Christian manhood. Any friends, I would you like to have your step firm? Would you walk with your head erect? Would you go forth into life's struggle as an athlete goes to the arena? Would you have faith in God, faith in your own self and faith in the work God has given you to do? Then to-day translate in your heart your Christian mother's and fathers' "psalm of life." Live for the highest ideals for which they lived. Walk with their Jesus as they walked. Live not for your selfish self, but live to do good to others. Then your heart will beat with a steadier throb than ever before.

Then thy brain will teem with mighty thoughts for helping thy fellow men. Then thy soul will sing with an immortal hope. Then thy earthly days will be prolonged and thy heavenly advent will be ushered in with the welcoming songs of those whom thou hast helped on their journey to the cross this side of the grave. Shall thy parents' "psalm of life" be thine—endless song? Answer Christ and answer him now. Wilt thou honor thy father and thy mother "that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord, thy God, giveth thee?"

STOMACH'S IMPORTANCE.

IMPERFECT DIGESTION MOST PROLIFIC CAUSE OF SERIOUS DISEASE.

Few people seem to realize the real dangers in disturbed, deficient or defective digestion.

Some health reports do not give indigestion as a cause of death, yet it is a result of it in fact, as it so weakens the stomach that one becomes readily susceptible to other ills which follow, such as kidney disease, nervous prostration or other serious or fatal disease. Mo-o-na stomach tablets are a positive instruction to weak stomachs. No-o-na is a feeling of heaviness in the stomach, sleepiness after eating, sick headache, dizziness, nausea, headaches, sleeplessness, specks before the eyes, sour stomach, irritable condition, with nervousness, weakness, loss of appetite, etc. Mo-o-na tablets are a positive cure for all these troubles. You run no risks whatever in buying Mo-o-na tablets.

We absolutely agree that your money will be refunded should you not find Mo-o-na tablets all we claim for them in the results. Mo-o-na is sold by druggists at fifty cents per box, or sent by mail on receipt of price, 50 cents.

Write to-day for free sample package, and also give us your symptoms, and we will have our physicians and specialists will give your case his care ful and personal attention, without charge.

ASKED FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Uriah Wilson wanted the papers in Preston, one night down. Proper records covering his official relations with the Government and he an interesting chapter for the public. But Mr. Oliver, the minister, said there were no papers of the kind, the enquiry was personal and verbal only. Mr. Wilson, of Lennox, has done well to raise the question in the interests of the public, and has promoted another department after the scandalous disclosures made in the department of immigration. This man whom Alfred Jury, British immigration agent, was sent out to report on immigration, went to China and Japan at a large increase of income, while Jury, whom W. T. R. Preston described as "a Toronto gentleman at ease" is sent back to his duty in England.

CHAPPED HANDS.

It is not the annoyance alone which makes chapped hands a source of grave trouble to housewives and out-door workers; it is the danger of festering and inflammation.

Irritation, swelling, cracks or scaling roughness round about the knuckles and the back of the hand are serious, and the greatest promptitude should be exercised in treating with Zam-Buk.

The affected part should be cleaned of any dirt. Then gently anoint with Zam-Buk, smearing with the fingers or spreading on clean linen.

Zam-Buk will soothe the irritation, and finally completely end the inflammation and pain. Swellings will go down, and over the raw surfaces Zam-Buk will GROW NEW HEALTHY SKIN. Hands soft, strong and white are possessed by those who use Zam-Buk regularly during the winter.

CONVINCING TESTIMONY

Mrs. H. H. Bantlin, of Arpin, Ont., says: "My hands had big cracks on them which caused me such pain I could hardly cook. Whenever I tried to wash them the cracks would smart and be in a fix I had sealed them. That fix not a fix to be described is anything I tried until Zam-Buk was in rudiment. To my great pleasure within a very short time Zam-Buk closed up the cracks and healed the sore place. My hands are now white and smooth. I recommended Zam-Buk to a friend who had a sore finger, and at cured that, too. I think it a splendid household ointment."

SKIN RASH AND ECZEMA CURED.

Mr. G. Shaw, 189 Givens St., Toronto, says: "Reading of the wonderful healing qualities of Zam-Buk, I thought I would try it, as I had been greatly annoyed for some time with an itching, irritating skin rash on both arms. I had tried various remedies, but failed to find a permanent cure. I used a pot of Zam-Buk and found relief in two weeks' time. The results were so satisfactory that I persevered, and in two weeks' time, through the use of Zam-Buk, the rash was completely removed. I found Zam-Buk when applied to the skin, to be very soothing, while itching was relieved instantly. I have had no trouble since from skin eruptions, and am fully convinced Zam-Buk cured me."

Mr. M. Adams, of Chestnut, says: "I have used Zam-Buk for four years and painful scalp sores. Zam-Buk cured me of both, although everything else I had tried completely failed."

Zam-Buk

Zam-Buk cures cuts, bruises, burns, scalds, eczema, purples, festering sores, poisoned wounds, sore feet, ulcers, sores, piles, bad leg, diseased ankles, abscesses, boils, ringworm, sore backs, tonsilitis, itch, sore breasts, barber's rash, and all injuries or diseased conditions of the skin, rubbed in once the part is affected. It stops pain, draws out inflammation, soothes, heals, and restores. From all druggists, 50c. per box, or post free from Zam-Buk Co., Clarence St., Toronto, upon receipt of price. 6 boxes for $2.50.

WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Sle, feeling his way—Do you think you could ever be happy with a man like me?

Sle—Well, perhaps—I do want to much like you.

They Cleanse the System Thoroughly. Dr. Pierce's Vegetable Pellets cleanse the stomach and bowels of biliousness, cause the secretory work to be properly performed, regulate the liver into the bowels and expel the deleterious matter from the body. They do it without pain or inconvenience to the system. So speedily realizes their good effects as soon as they begin to operate. They build up strong constitutions from all kinds of disease.

"It would be a great pleasure to me Miss Stout," said Mr. Dubley, to have you go to the theatre with me this evening."

"Have you secured the seats?" asked Miss Vera Stout.

"Why, no, really, you're not so fearfully keen as all that."

They Advertise Themselves. — Imitated only they were offered to the public. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil has become popular because of the good report made for them. Time has proved the put on has grown, and they now rank amongst the first medicines for cure in attacks of dyspepsia and biliousness, complaints of the throat and lungs, rheumatism, fever and ague, and the innumerable complaints to which these ailments give rise.

Mother—Willie, why did you come into the parlor and ask for a piece of cake when I had called you to the kitchen? I wanted to tell you I'd never get it.

Willie—Because I'd never get it waited.

Sudden transition from a hot to a cold temperature, exposure to rain, etc., in a draught, unemsonable substitution of light for heavy clothing, are the fruitful cause of colds and the resultant cough so perious to person of weak lungs. Among the many remedies for bronchial disorders no one has gained a better name than Hckle's Anti-Consumptive Syrup. Try and become convinced. Price 25 cents.

Tim—There goes a man who has done much to arouse the people.

Tom—Indeed! Whom do you suppose?

Tim—Naw; alarm clock manufacturer.

We All Have Maisons in the World. —There is much work to do for every man on earth, there is a function to perform for everything. Everything has its mission, and the mission of Thomas' Eclectric Oil is to heal burns and wounds of every description and kind, to relieve croup and all affections of the respiratory organs.

Mrs. Hicks, relating burglar scare at 1, I want a man to get up, and there under the bed I saw a man's legs.

Mrs. Wicks—Mercy! the burglar's?

"No, my husband's—he had hired the room, too."

Parents buy Mother Graves' Worm Exterminator because they know it is a safe medicine for their children and an effectual expeller of worms.

Governess—You're a naughty little girl, Christabel, to talk your cousin like that!

Christabel—I didn't kick her, Governess—Oh, hush, dear! I saw you kick her several times.

Christabel—I didn't. I missed her every time.

Where can I get some of Hollo-way's Corn Cure? I was astonished cured of my corns by its remedy, and I want to get some more of it for my friends I've gone away from. Chicago's So writes Mr. J.

"They say" remarked the first dear girl, "that Mr. Skyeleigh is engaged to a man old enough to be her grandfather."

"Indeed!" exclaimed dear girl No. 2. "I had no idea there was a man that old alive!"

"Why don't you get up and give that lady your seat, father," Bobby was commanded the woman. "Doesn't you know you to see mens feeding for t ostay?"

"Not on a train," chuckled Bobby.

Sle—Now, my dear, when had I better speak to your father about our engagement?

Her—Be in now. The dressmaker has just left the bill for my new spring clothes.

Has been the people of your town out West discovered that the Mayor had been misappropriating the public moneys, and that after said date the said Administrator will proceed to distribute the assets of the deceased among the parties entitled thereto, having regard only to the claims of which said Administrator shall then have notice.

A NICE XMAS GIFT.

The shelves in the public library will soon require enlarging in order to accommodate the new books that are constantly coming in. The greatest care is taken in selecting them and no book is accepted until it has been read or reviewed by one or more members of a reading committee, consisting of the entire board and several other subscribers in whose judgment the board has confidence. There are books to suit all ages and tastes, except the depraved. A neat card of membership has been prepared suitable for presentation as a Christmas gift and may be had upon application to the librarian. Anyone desiring to make a present to a friend cannot make a wiser selection than a year's subscription to the public library. It means cheer, comfort and company for each day out of the 365.

"But he's jes' a goat puncher er a"—

"He's a man, if there ever was one. Don't let me hear you call him a goat puncher again. How are his legs?" Aunt Fanny was almost stunned by this amazing question from her ever decorous mistress. "Why don't you answer? Will they have to be cut off? Didn't you see them?"

"Fo' de Lawd's sake, missy, co'se Ah did, but yo' all kindeh suspise me. Dey's pretty bad skins up, missy; de blade's peeled up consid'ble. But hit ain' dang'ous, no, ma'am—jes' skun; dat's all."

"And his arm—where I shot him?"

"Puffec'ly tiflin', ma'am—yo' highness. Cobwebs 'd stop de bleedin', an' Ah tole 'em so, but dey feltieh coulkin' un'stan' me. Misteh Wheeler-ba-beaum, he says somethin' to de doctch, an' den dey goes afteh de cobwebs, suah 'nough. 'Twin' bleedin' no mo', missy. He's mostes neah doin' ve'y fine. Co'se he cain' walk fo' sev'l days wiv dem bigs o' his'n, but"—

"There, in heaven's name, how are we to get to Edelweiss?"

"He c'n ride, cain't he? Wha's to hindeh him?"

Quite right. He shall ride inside the coach. Go and see if I can do anything for him."

Aunt Fanny returned in a few minutes.

"He says yo'll do him a great favoh if yo' jes' go to baid. He sends his 'spects an' hopes yo' slumbeh won' be disturbed ag'in."

"He's a perfect brute!" exclaimed Beverly, but she went over and crawled under the blankets and among the cushions the wounded man had scorned.

CHAPTER VII.

THERE was a soft, warm, yellow glow to the world when Beverly Calhoun next looked upon it. The sun from his throne in the mountain tops was smiling down upon the valley the night had ravaged while he was on the other side of the earth. The leaves of the trees were a softer green, the white of the rocks and the yellow of the road were of a gentler tint. The brown and green reeds were proudly erect once more.

The stirring of the mountain men had awakened Aunt Fanny, and she in turn called her mistress from the surprisingly peaceful slumber into which perfect health had sent her not so many hours before. At the entrance to the improvised bedchamber stood buckets of water from the spring.

"We have very thoughtful chambermaids," remarked Beverly while Aunt Fanny was putting her hair into presentable shape. "And an energetic cook," she added as the odor of broiled meat came to her nostrils.

"Ah cain' see nothin' o' dat beastes, Miss Beverly, an' Ah—Ah got mah suspicions," said Aunt Fanny, with sepulchral despair in her voice.

"They've thrown the awful thing into the river," concluded Beverly.

"Dey's cookin' hit!" said Aunt Fanny solemnly.

"Good heaven, no!" cried Beverly. "Go and see, this minute. I wouldn't eat that catlike thing for the whole world." Aunt Fanny came back a few minutes later with the assurance that they were roasting goat meat. The skin of the midnight visitor was stretched upon the ground not far away.

"And how is he?" asked Beverly, jamming a hatpin through a helpless bunch of violets.

"He's ve'y 'spectably skun, yo' highness."

"I don't mean the animal, stupid."

"Yo' mean 'at Misteh Goat Man? He's settin' up an' chattin' as if nothin' happened. He says to me 'at we staht on ouah way jes' as soon as yo' all eats yo' breakfus'. De hosses is hitched up an'"—

"Has everybody else eaten? Am I the only one that hasn't?" cried Beverly.

"'Ceptin' me, yo' highness. Ah'm as hungry as a poah man's dawg, an' "—

"And he is being kept from the hospital because I am a lazy, good for nothing little— Come on, Aunt Fanny; we haven't a minute to spare. If he looks very ill, we do without breakfast."

But Baldos was the most cheerful man in the party. He was sitting with his back against a tree, his right arm in a sling of woven reeds, his black patch set upon the proper eye.

"You will pardon me for not rising," he said cheerily, "but, your highness, I am much too awkward this morning to act as befitting a courtier in the presence of his sovereign. You have slept well?"

"Too well, I fear. So well, in fact, that you have suffered for it. Can't we start at once?" She was debating within herself whether it would be quite good form to shake hands with the reclining hero. In the glare of the broad daylight he and his followers looked more ragged and famished than before, but they also appeared more picturesquely romantic.

"When you have eaten of our humble fare, your highness—the last meal at the Hawk and Raven."

"But I'm not a bit hungry."

"It is very considerate of you, but equally unreasonable. You must eat before we start."

"I can't bear the thought of your suffering when we should be hurrying to a hospital and competent surgeons." He laughed gayly. "Oh, you needn't laugh. I know it hurts. You may we cannot reach Edelweiss before tomorrow? Well, we cannot stop here a minute longer than we— Oh, thank you!" A ragged servitor had placed a rude bowl of meat and some fruit before her.

"Sit down here, your highness, and prepare yourself for a long fast. We may go until nightfall without food. The game is scarce, and we dare not venture far into the hills."

Beverly sat at his feet and daintily began the operation of picking a bone with her pretty fingers and teeth. "I am sorry we have no knives and forks," he apologized.

"I don't mind," said she. "I wish you would remove that black patch."

"Alas, I must resume the hated disguises. A chance enemy might recognise me."

"Your clothes have been mended," she remarked, with a furtive glance at his long legs. The trousers had been rudely sewed up and no bandages were visible. "Are you—your legs terribly hurt?"

"They are badly scratched, but not seriously. The bandages are skillfully placed," he added, seeing her look of doubt. "Ravens is a genius."

"Well, I'll hurry," she said, blushing deeply. Goat hunter though he was and she a princess, his eyes gleamed with the joy of her beauty, and his heart thumped with a most unruly admiration. "You were very, very brave last night," she said at last, and her rescuer smiled contentedly.

She was not long in finishing the rude but wholesome meal and then announced her readiness to be on the way. With the authority of a genuine princess she commanded him to ride inside the coach, gave incomprehensible directions to the driver and to the escort and would listen to none of his protestations. When the clumsy vehicle was again in the highway and bumping over the ridges of flint the goat hunter was beside his princess on the rear seat, his feet upon the opposite cushions near Aunt Fanny, a well arranged bridge of boxes and bags providing support for his long legs.

"We want to go to a hospital," Beverly had said to the driver very much as she might have spoken had she been in Washington. She was standing bravely beside the fore wheel, her face flushed and eager. Baldos from his serene position on the cushions watched her with kindling eyes. The grizzled driver grinned and shook his head despairingly. "Oh, please! You don't understand. Oh, you! Hospital—h-o-s-p-i-t-a-l," she spelt it out for him, and still he shook his head. Others in the motley retinue were smiling broadly.

"Speak to him in your own language, your highness, and he will be sure to understand," ventured the patient.

"I am speaking in my own language, I prefer to speak in English. Please tell him to go to a hospital," she said confusedly. Baldos gave a few jovial instructions, and then the ragged courtier of them all handed Beverly into the carriage with a grace that amazed her.

"You are the most remarkable goat hunters I have ever seen," she remarked in sincere wonder.

"And you speak the most perfect English I've ever heard," he replied.

"Oh, do you really think so? Miss Grimes used to say I was hopeless. You know I had a—a tutor," she hastily explained. "Don't you think it strange we've met no English soldiers?" she went on, changing the subject abruptly.

"We are not yet out of the woods," he said.

"That was a purely American aphorism," she cried, looking at him intently. "Where did you learn all your English?"

"I had a tutor," he answered easily.

"You are a very odd person," she sighed. "I don't believe that you are a goat hunter at all."

"If I were not a goat hunter I should have starved long ago," he said. "Why do you doubt me?"

"Simply because you treat me one moment as if I were a princess and the next as if I were a child. Humble goat hunters do not forget their station in life."

"I have much to learn of the deference due to queens," he said.

"That's just like 'The Mikado' or 'Pinafore,'" she exclaimed. "I believe you are a comic opera brigand or a pirate chieftain, after all."

"I am a lowly outcast," he smiled.

"Well, I've decided to take you into Edelweiss and"—

"Pardon me, your highness," he said firmly. "That cannot be. I shall not go to Edelweiss."

"But I command you"—

"It's very kind of you, but I cannot enter a hospital—not even at Gaulook. I may as well confess that I am a hunted man and that the instructions are to take me dead or alive."

"Impossible!" she gasped, involuntarily shrinking from him.

"I have wronged no man, yet I am being hunted down as though I were a beast," he said, his face turning haggard for the moment. "The hills of Graustark, the plateaus of Axphain and the valleys of Dawsbergen are alive with men who are bent on ending my unhappy but inconvenient existence. It would be suicide for me to enter any one of your towns or cities. Even you could not protect me, I fear."

"This sounds like a dream. Oh, dear me, you don't look like a hardened criminal," she cried.

"I am the humble leader of the faithful band who will die with me when the time comes. We are not criminals, your highness. In return for what service I may have performed for you, I implore you to question me no further. Let me be your slave up to the walls of Gaulook, and then you may forget Baldos, the goat hunter."

"I never can forget you," she cried, touching his injured arm gently. "Will you forget the one that gave you this wound?"

"It is a very gentle wound, and I love it so that I pray it may never heal." She looked away suddenly.

"Tell me one thing," she said, a stiff coming over her eyes. "You say they are hunting you do the death. Then—then your fault must be a grievous one. Have you—have you killed a man?" she added hastily. He was silent for a few times.

"I fear I have killed more than one man," he said in low tones. Again she shrank into the corner of the coach. "History says that your father was a brave soldier and fought in many battles. He went on.

"Yes," she said, thinking of Major George Calhoun.

"He killed men then, perhaps, as I have killed them," he said.

"Oh, my father never killed a man!" cried Beverly in devout horror.

"Yet Graustark reverses his mighty process on the field of battle," said he, half iaconically.

"Oh," she murmured, remembering that she was now the daughter of Yetive's father. "I see. You are not a—a—a mere murderer, then?"

"No. I have been a soldier. That is all."

"Thank heaven!" she murmured and was no longer afraid of him. "Would—would a pardon be of any especial benefit to you?" she asked, wondering how far her influence might go with the Princess Yetive.

"It is beyond your power to help me," he said gravely. She was silent, but it was the silence of deep reflection. "Your highness left the castle ten days ago," he said, dismissing himself as a subject for conversation. "Have you kept in close communication with Edelweiss during that time?"

"I know nothing of what is going on there," she said quite truthfully. She only knew that she had sent a message to the Princess Yetive apprising her of her arrival in St. Petersburg and of her intention to leave soon for the Graustark capital.

"Then you do not know that Mr. Lorry is still on the Dawsbergen frontier in conference with representatives from Serros. He may not return for a week, so Colonel Quinnox brings back word."

"It's news to me," murmured Beverly.

"You do not seem to be alarmed," he ventured. "Yet I fancy it is not a dangerous mission, although Prince Gabriel is ready to battle at a moment's notice."

"I have the utmost confidence in Mr. Lorry," said Beverly, with proper pride.

"Baron Danglous, your minister of police, is in these mountains watching the operations of Axphain scouts and spies."

"Is he? You are very well posted, it seems."

"Moreover, the Axphainians are planning to attack Gaulook upon the first signal from their ruler. I do not wish to alarm your highness, but we may as well expect trouble before we come to the Gaulook gates. You are known to be in the pass, and I am certain an effort will be made to take possession of your person."

"They wouldn't dare," she exclaimed. "Uncle Sam would annihilate them in a week."

"Uncle Sam? Is he related to your Aunt Fanny? I'm afraid he could do but little against Yolga's fighting men," he said, with a smile.

"They'd soon find out who Uncle Sam is if they touched a hair of my head grandly. He seemed puzzled, but was too polite to press her for explanations. "But he is a long way off, and couldn't help if you were suddenly attacked from ambush, could he? What would they do to me if I were taken, as you suggest?" She was more concerned than she appeared to be.

"With you in their hands, Graustark would be utterly helpless. Yolga could demand anything she liked and your ministry would be forced to submit."

"I really think it would be a capital joke on the Princess Yolga," mused Beverly reflectively. He did not know what she meant, but regarded her soft smile as the clear title to the serenity of a princess.

She sank back and gave herself over to the complications that were likely to grow out of her involuntary deception. The one thing which worried her more than all others was the fear that Yetive might not be in Edelweiss. According to all reports, she had lately been in St. Petersburg, and the mere fact that she was supposed to be traveling by coach was sufficient proof that she was not at her capital. Then there was, of course, the possibility of trouble on the road with the Axphain scouts, but Beverly enjoyed the optimism of youth and civilisation.

Baldos, the goat hunter, was dreaming thinking of the beautiful young woman at his side and of the queer freak fortune had played in bringing them together. As he studied her face he could not but admit that marriage at least established a barrier between her and the advances his bold heart might otherwise be willing to risk. His black hair straggled down over his forehead, and his dark eyes—the patch had been surreptitiously lifted—were unusually pensive.

"It is strange that you live in Graustark and have not seen its princess—before," she said, laying groundwork for inquiry concerning the acts and characters of the real princess.

"May it please your highness, I have not lived long in Graustark. Besides, it is said that half the people of Gaulook have never looked upon your face."

"I'm not surprised at that. The proportion is much smaller than I imagined. I have not visited Gaulook, strange as it may seem to you."

"One of my company fell in with some of your guards from the Gaulook garrison day before yesterday. He learned that you were to reach that city within forty-eight hours. A large detachment of men has been sent to meet you at Labbot."

"Oh, indeed," said Beverly, very much interested.

"They must have been misinformed as to your route or else your Russian guards decided to take you through by the lower and more hazardous way. It was our luck that you came by the wrong road. Otherwise we should not have met each other; and the Hon," he said, smiling reflectively.

"Where is Labbot?" asked she, intent upon the one subject uppermost in her mind.

"In the mountains many leagues north of this pass. Had you taken that route instead of this you would by this time have left Labbot for the town of Erros, a half day's journey from Gaulook. Instead of vagabonds your escort would have been made up of loyal soldiers, well fed, well clad and well satisfied with themselves at least."

"But no braver, no truer than my soldiers of Bertana," she said earnestly. "By the way, are you informed as to the state of affairs in Dawsbergen?"

"Nothing of import, I dare say, that must be," he replied.

"The young prince—what's his name?" she paused, looking to him for the name.

"Danten?"

"Yes, that's it. What has become of him? I am terribly interested in him."

"He is a fugitive, they say."

"They haven't captured him, then? Good! I am so glad!"

Baldos exhibited little or no interest in the fresh topic.

"It is strange you should have forgotten Prince Gabriel so quickly."

"Oh, I do so many ridiculous things!" complained Beverly, remembering who she was supposed to be. "I have never seen him, you know," she added.

"It is not strange, your highness. He was educated in England and had seen little of his own country when he was called to the throne two years ago. You remember of course that his mother was an Englishwoman, Lady Ida Falconer."

"I—I think I have heard some of his history. A very little, to be sure," she explained lamely.

"Prince Gabriel, his half brother, is the son of Prince Louis III. by his first wife, who was a Polish countess. After her death, when Gabriel was two years old, the prince married Lady Ida. Dantan is their son. He has a sister, Candace, who is but nineteen years of age."

"I am ashamed to confess that you know so much more about my neighbors than I," she said.

"I lived in Dawsbergen for a little while and was ever interested in the doings of royalty. That is a poor man's privilege, you know."

"Prince Gabriel must be a terrible man," cried Beverly, her heart swelling with pity for the thoughts of the exiled Dantan and his little sister.

"You have cause to know," said he shortly, and she was perplexed until she recalled the stories of Gabriel's misdemeanors at the court of Edelweiss.

"Is Prince Dantan as handsome as they say he is?" she asked.

"It is entirely a matter of opinion," he replied. "I for one do not consider him at all prepossessing."

The day went on, fatiguing, distressing in its length and its happenings. Progress was necessarily slow, the perils of the road increasing as the little cavalcade wound deeper and deeper into the wilderness. There were times when the coach fairly crawled along the edge of a precipice, a proceeding so hazardous that Beverly shuddered as if in a chill. Aunt Fanny slept serenely most of the time, and Baldos took to dreaming with his eyes wide open. Contrary to her expectations, the Axphainians did not appear, and if there were robbers in the hills they thought better than to attack the valorous looking party. It dawned upon Beverly that the Axphainians were guarding the upper route and not the one over which she was traveling. Yetive doubtless was approaching Gaulook over the northern pass, provided the enemy had not been encountered before Labbot was reached. Beverly soon found herself fearing for the safety of the princess, a fear which at last became almost unendurable.

Near nightfall they came upon three Graustark soldiers and learned that Gaulook could not be reached before the next afternoon. The tired, hungry travelers spent the night in a snug little valley through which a rivulet bounded onward to the river below. The supper was a scant one, the foraging party poor hands in the hunt for food. Baldos saw them on their way once more. Hunger and dread had worn down Beverly's supply of good spirits; she was having fearful visions of a hospital, dismissed looks from her face. Her tender, hopeful eyes were not so bold or so merry as on the day before; cheerfulness cost her an effort, but she managed to keep it fairly alive. Her escort, wrecked and half starved, never forget the deference due to their charge, but strode steadily on with the dauntless of martyrs. At times it was repelled to disclose her true identity, but reflection told her that deception was her best safeguard.

Late in the afternoon of the second day the front axle of the coach snapped in two, and a tedious delay of four hours ensued. Baldos was strangely silent and subdued. It was not until misfortune came that Beverly observed the flushed condition of his face. Involuntarily and with the compassion of a true woman, she touched his hand and brow. They were burning hot. The wounded man was in a high fever. He laughed at her fears and scoffed at the prospect of blood poisoning and the hundred other possibilities that suggested themselves to her anxious brain.

"We are close to Gaulook," he said, with the setting of the sun. "Soon you may be relieved of your tiresome, cheerless company, your highness."

"You are going to a physician," she said resolutely, alive and active once more, now that the worst part of the journey was coming to an end. "Tell that man to drive in a gallop all the rest of the way."

CHAPTER VIII.

BY this time they were passing the queer little huts that marked the outskirts of a habitable community. These were the homes of shepherds, hunters and others whose vocations related especially to the mountains. Further on there were signs of farming interests; the homes became more numerous and more pretentious in appearance. The rock lined gorge broadened into a fertile valley; the road was smooth and level, a condition which afforded relief to the travelers. Havens had once more dressed the wounds inflicted by the lion, but he was unable to provide anything to subdue the fever. Baldos was undeniably ill. Beverly, between her exclamations of joy and relief at being in sight of Gaulook, was profuse in her expressions of concern for the hero of the Hawk and Raven. The feverish gleam in his dark eyes and the pain that marked his face touched her deeply. Suffering softened his lean, sun browned features, obliterating the mocking lines that had impressed her so unfavorably at the outset. She was saying to herself that he was handsome after a most unusual cast; it was an unforgettable face.

"Your highness," he said earnestly, after she had looked long and anxiously at his half closed eyes, "we are within an hour of Gaulook. It will be dark before we reach the gates, I know, but you have nothing to fear during the rest of the trip. Franz shall drive you to the sentry post and turn over the horses to your own men. My friends and I must leave you at the end of the mountain road. We are"—

"Ridiculous!" she cried. "I'll not permit it! You must go to a hospital."

"If I enter the Gaulook gates it will be the same as entering the gates of death," he protested.

"Nonsense! You have a fever or you wouldn't talk like that. I can promise you absolute security."

"You do not understand, your highness."

"Nevertheless, you are going to a hospital," she firmly said. "You would die out here in the wilds, so what are the odds either way? Aunt Fanny, will you be careful? Don't you know that the least movement of those bags hurts him?"

"Please do not mind me, your highness. I am doing very well," he said, smiling.

The coach brought up in front of a roadside inn. While some of the men were watering the horses others gathered about its open window. A conversation in a tongue utterly incomprehensible to Beverly took place between Baldos and his followers. The latter seemed to be disturbed about something, and there was no mistaking the solicitous air with which they regarded their leader. The pseudo princess was patient as long as possible and then broke into the discussion.

"What do they want?" she demanded in English.

"They are asking for instructions," he answered.

"Instruct them to do as I bid," she said. "Tell them to hurry along and get you a doctor; that's all."

Evidently his friends were of the same opinion, for after a long harangue in which he was obdurate to the last they left the carriage, and he sank back with a groan of dejection.

"What is it?" she anxiously demanded.

"They also insist that I shall go to a surgeon," he said hopelessly. His eyes were closed, and he could not meet her gaze. She was full of exultation. "They have advised me to put myself under your protection. Command me, your highness, and I obey. You and you alone have the power to protect me if I pass beyond the walls of Gaulook."

"I?" she cried, all a-flutter.

"I could not trust my head into the jaws of death unless the princess of Graustark were there to stay their fury. Your royal hand alone can untangle my terrible. Alas, I am helpless and know not what to do."

Beverly Calhoun sat very straight and

16½ PACES EAST OF ROYAL HOTEL

Lawrason & Co.,

DRUGGISTS. R. H. J. PASMORE, Manager.

"Aunt Fanny, will you be careful?"

silent beside the misguided Baron. After all, it was not within her power to protect him. She was not the princess, and she had absolutely no influence in Ganiook. The authorities there could not be deceived as had been their ignorant men of the Alps. If she had only had the city to herself! She could do some fever. Beverly was in a most unhappy state of mind. If she confessed to him that she was not the princess he would refuse to enter the gates of Ganiook, and be perfectly justified in doing so.

"But if I should fail?" she asked at last, a shiver rushing over her and tearing her cold with dread.

"You are the only hope, your highness. You had better say farewell to Baldos and let him again seek the friendly valley," said he wearily. "We can go no farther. The soldiers must be near, your highness. It means capture if we go on. I cannot expose my friends to the dangers. Let me be put down here and do you go on on to safety. I shall fare much better than you think, for I am young and strong and"—

"No! I'll risk it," she cried. "You must go into the city. Tell them so, and say that I will protect you with my own life and honor."

Fever made him submissive. Her eyes gave him confidence. Her voice soothed his fears. If he possessed the cunning from the window he called him men together. Beverly looked on in wonder as these strange men bade farewell to their leader. Many of them were weeping, and most of them kissed his hand. There were broken sentences, tear choked promises, anxious inquiries, and the parting was drawn out.

"Where are they going?" Beverly whispered as they moved away in the dusk.

"Back into the mountains to starve, poor fellows. God be kind to them, God be good to them," he half sobbed, his chin dropping to his breast. He was trembling like a leaf.

"Starve?" she whispered. "Have they no money?"

"We are penniless," came in muffled tones from the stricken leader.

Beverly leaned from the window and called to the departing ones. Ivanone and another reluctantly approached. Without a word she opened a small traveling bag and drew forth a purse. This she pressed into the hand of the student. It was filled with Graustark gavvos, for which she had exchanged American gold in Ganiook.

"God be with you!" she fervently cried. He kissed her hand, and the two stood aside to let the coach roll on into the dusky darkness. It separated them from the gates of Ganiook, old Franz still driving, the only one of the company left to serve his leader to the very end.

"Well, we have left them," muttered Baldos as though to himself. "I may never see them again—never see them again. And how true they have been!"

"I shall send for them the moment I get to Ganiook, and I'll promise pardons for them all!" she cried rashly in her compassion.

"No," he exclaimed fiercely; "you are not to disturb them. Better that they should starve."

Beverly was sufficiently subdued. As they drew nearer the city gates her heart began to fail her. This man's life was in her weak, incapable hands, and the time was nearing when she must stand between him and disaster.

"Where are these vaunted soldiers of yours?" he suddenly asked, infinite irony in his voice.

"In soldiers?" she said faintly.

"Isn't it rather unusual that in time of trouble and uncertainty we should be able to approach within a mile of one of your most important cities without even so much as seeing a soldier of Graustark?"

She felt that he was scoffing, but it smattered little to her.

"It is a bit odd, isn't it?" she agreed.

"Worse than that, your highness."

"I shall speak to Lorry about it," she said serenely, and he looked up in new surprise. Truly she was an extraordinary princess.

Fully three-quarters of an hour passed before the coach was checked. Beverly, looking from the windows, had seen the lighted windows of cottages growing closer and closer together. The barking of roadside dogs was the only sound that could be heard above the rattle of the wheels. It was the dark inside the coach to see the face of the man beside her, but something told her that he was staring intently into the night, alert and anxious. The responsibility of her position swooped down upon her like an avalanche as she thought of what the next few minutes were to bring forth. It was the sudden stopping of the coach and the sharp commands from the outside that told her probation was at an end. She could no longer speculate; it was high time to act.

"The outpost," came from Baldos, in strained tones.

"Perhaps they won't know us—you, I mean," she whispered.

"Baron Dangloss knows everybody," he replied bitterly.

"What a horrid old busybody he"—she started to say, but thought better of it.

A couple of lanterns flashed at the window, almost blinding her. Aunt Fanny groaned audibly, but the figure of Baldos seemed to stiffen with defiance. Uniformed men appeared in the lantern with more rudeness and curiosity than seemed respectful to a princess, to say the least. They saw a pretty, pleading face, with wide gray eyes and parted lips, but they did not bow in humble submission, as Baldos had expected. One of the men, evidently in command, addressed Beverly in rough but polite tones. It was a question that he asked, she knew, but she could not answer him, for she could not understand him.

"What do you want?" she put in English, with a creditable display of

"He does not speak English, your highness," volunteered Baldos in a voice so well disguised that it startled her. The officer was staring blankly at her.

"Every officer in my army should and must learn to speak English," she said, at her wits' end. "I decline to be questioned by the fellow. Will you talk to him in my stead?"

"I, your highness?" he cried in dismay.

"Yes. Tell him who we are and ask where the hospital is," she murmured, sinking back with the air of a queen, but with the inward feeling that all was lost.

"But I don't speak your language well," he protested.

"You speak it beautifully," she said. Baldos leaned forward painfully and spoke to the officer in the Graustark tongue.

"Don't you know your princess?" he demanded a trifle harshly. The man's eyes flew wide open in an instant and his jaw dropped.

"The—the princess?" he gasped.

"Don't stare like that, sir. Direct us to the main gate at once, or you will have cause to regret your stupidity."

"But the princess was—is coming by the northern pass," mumbled the man. "The guard has gone out to meet her and"— Baldos cut him off shortly with the information that the princess, as he could see, had come by the lower pass and that she was eager to reach a resting place at once. The convincing tone of the speaker and the regal indifference of the lady had full effect upon the officer, who had never seen her highness. He fell back with a deep obeisance and gave a few bewildered commands to his men. The coach moved off, attended by a party of foot soldiers, and Beverly breathed her first sigh of relief.

"You did it beautifully," she whispered to Baldos, and he was considerably puzzled by the ardor of her praise. "Where are we going now?" she asked.

"Into the city, your highness," he answered. It was beginning to dawn upon him that she was amazingly ignorant and inconsequential for one who enjoyed the right to command these common soldiers. Her old trepidation returned with this brief answer. Something told her that he was beginning to mistrust her at last. After all, it mattered everything to him and so little to her.

When the coach halted before the city gates she was in a dire state of unhappiness. In the darkness she could feel the reproachful eyes of old Aunt Fanny searching for her abandoned conscience.

"Ask if Baron Dangloss is in Ganiook, and, if he is, command them to take me to him immediately," she whispered to Baldos, a new inspiration seizing her. She would lay the whole matter before the great chief of police and trust to luck. Her hand fell impulsively upon his and, to her amazement, it was as cold as ice. "What is the matter?" she cried in alarm.

"You trusted me in the wilds, your highness," he said tensely; "I am trusting you now." Before she could reply the officer in charge of the city gates appeared at the coach window. There were lights on all sides. Her heart sank like lead. It would be a miracle if she passed the gates unrecognized.

"I must see Baron Dangloss at once," she cried in English, utterly disdaining her instructions to Baldos.

"The baron is engaged at present and can see no one," responded the good looking young officer in broken English.

"Where is he?" she demanded nervously.

"He is at the house of Colonel Goax, the commandant. What is your business with him?"

"It is with him, and not with you, sir," she said, imperious once more. "Conduct me to him immediately."

"You cannot enter the gates unless I so"—

"Insolence!" exclaimed Baldos. "Is this the way, sir, in which you address the princess? Make way for her."

"The princess!" gasped the officer. Then a peculiar smile overspread his face. He had served three years in the castle guard at Edelweiss. There was a long pause, fraught with disaster for Beverly. "Yes, perhaps it is just as well that we conduct her to Baron Dangloss," he said at last. The deep meaning in his voice appealed only to the unhappy girl. "There shall be no murder chiaut, your highness!" he added mockingly. A moment later the gates swung open and they passed through. Beverly alone knew that they were going to Baron Dangloss under heavy guard, virtually as prisoners. The man knew her to be an impostor and was doing only his duty.

There were smiles of derision on the faces of the soldiers when Beverly swept proudly between the files and up the steps leading to the commandant's door, but there were no audible remarks. Baldos followed, walking painfully, but defiantly, and Aunt Fanny came last, with the hand bag. The guards grinned broadly as the corpulent negress waddled up the steps. The young officer and two men entered the door with the wayfarers, who were ordered to halt in the hallway.

"Will your highness come with me?" said the officer, returning to the hall after a short interval. There was no mistakable derision in his voice and palpable insolence in his manner. Beverly flushed angrily. "Baron Dangloss is very busy, your highness," he added, with a smile. Nevertheless he shrank a bit beneath the cold gleam in the eyes of the impostor.

"You will remain here," she said, turning to Baldos and the negress. "And you will have nothing whatever to say to the very impertinent officer," she added. The "impertinent young man" actually chuckled.

"Follow me, your most royal highness," he said, and parted his lips, but they did not bow in humble submission, as Baldos had expected. One of the men, evidently in command, addressed Beverly in rough but polite tones. It was a question that he asked, she knew, but she could not answer him, for she could not understand him.

"What do you want?" she put in English, with a creditable display of it. Lowbow he was in a much more imperfect English. She remained in the hall and stood in the presence of the tall, flushed stranger with the rapped uniform.

A short, fierce little man in the picturesque uniform of a Graustark officer arose as Beverly entered the room. His scarred head bristled as though it were concealing a smile, but his manner was polite, even deferential. She advanced fearlessly, a slight touch of wayward smile struggling into her face.

"I dare say you know I am not the princess," she said composedly. Every vestige of fear was gone now that she had reached the line of battle. The doughty baron looked somewhat surprised at this frank way of opening an interview.

"I am quite well aware of it," he said politely.

"They say you know every one, Baron Dangloss," she boldly said. "Pray, who am I?"

The powerful official looked at the smiling face for a moment, his bushy eyebrows contracting ever so slightly. There was a faint pencil of light across her cheek, but there was also a dimple there that appealed to the grim old man. His eyes twinkled as he replied, with fine obsequiousness:

"You are Miss Beverly Calhoun of Washington."

CHAPTER IX.

BEVERLY'S eyes showed her astonishment. Baron Dangloss pointed politely to a chair for her and asked her to be seated.

"We were expecting you, Miss Calhoun," he explained. "Her excellency left St. Petersburg but a few hours after your departure, having unfortunately missed you."

"You don't mean to say that the princess tried to find me in St. Petersburg?" cried Beverly in wonder and delight.

"That was one of the purposes of her visit," said he brusquely.

"Oh, how jolly!" cried she, her gray eyes sparkling. This old captain was startled for the smallest fraction of a minute, but at once fell to admiring the fresh, eager face of the visitor.

"The public at large is under the impression that she visited the czar on matters of importance," he said, with a condescending smile.

"And it really was of no importance at all; that's what you mean?" She smiled back securely.

"Your message informing her highness of your presence in St. Petersburg had no sooner arrived than she sent forth to meet you in that city, much against the advice of her counselors. I will admit that she had other business there, but it could have waited. You, Miss Calhoun, it was a great risk at this particular time. Misfortune means disaster now. But Providence was her friend. She returned safely in Ganiook not an hour since."

"Really? Oh, Baron Dangloss, where is she?" excitedly cried the American girl.

"For the night she is stopping with the Countess Rallowitz, who, I understand, is not unknown to you. Her at the gates, has just been dispatched at her command to search for you in the lower pass. Ah, here is the most distinguished, Miss Calhoun, and I am amazed that you came through in safety."

"The Russians chose the lower pass, I know not why. Of course, I was quite ignorant. However, we met neither brigands nor soldiers, Axphain or Graustark. I encountered nothing more alarming than a mountain lion. And that, Baron Dangloss, recalls me to the sense of a duty I have been neglecting. A poor wanderer in the hills defended me against the beast and was badly wounded. He must be taken to a hospital at once, sir, where he may have the proper care."

Whereupon, at his request, she hurriedly related the story of that trying journey through the mountains, not forgetting to paint the courage of Baldos in most glowing colors. The chief was deeply interested in the story of the goat hunter and his party. There was an odd gleam of satisfaction in his eyes, but she did not observe it.

"You will see that he has immediate attention, won't you?" she implored in the end.

"He shall have our deepest consideration," promised he.

"You know I am rather interested because I shot him, just as if it were not enough that his leg was being torn by the brute at the time. He ought not to walk, Baron Dangloss. If you don't mind, I'd suggest an ambulance," she hurried on glibly. He could not conceal the smile that her eagerness inspired. "Really, he is a serious condition. I think he needs some quinine and whisky, too, and"—

"He shall have the best of care," interrupted the captain. "Leave him to me, Miss Calhoun."

"Now, let me tell you something," said she, after due reflection. "You must not pay any attention to what he says. He is liable to be delirious and talk in a terrible sort of way. You know, delirious people never talk rationally." She was loyally trying to protect Baldos, the hunted, against any incriminating statements he might make.

"Quite right, Miss Calhoun," said the baron very gravely.

"And now, I'd like to go to the princess," she said bravely, absolutely sure of herself. "You know, we are great friends, she and I."

"I have sent a messenger to announce your arrival, and she will expect you." Beverly looked about the room in perplexity.

"But there has been no messenger here," she said.

"He left here some minutes before you came. I knew who it was that came to see me, and I knew that nothing else prevailed at Princess Tetive of Graustark."

"And, oh, that reminds me, Baron Dangloss, Baldos still believes me to be the princess. Is it necessary to tell him the truth about me? Just at present, I am afraid, he will not much care if he doesn't know differently."

"So far as I am concerned, Miss Calhoun, he shall always regard you as a queen," said Dangloss gallantly.

"Thank you. It's very nice of you

A man in uniform entered after knocking at the door of the room. He saluted the baron and uttered a few words in his own language.

"Her royal highness is awaiting you at the home of the countess, sir," said he. A detail of men will escort you and your servant to her place."

"Now, please, Baron Dangloss," pleaded Beverly at the door, "be nice to him. You know it hurts him to walk. Can't you have him carried in?" A grim smile crossed his face quietly. Beverly hurried into the outer room after giving the baron a smile he never forgot. Baldos looked up eagerly, anxiously.

"It's all right," she said in low tones, pausing for a moment beside his chair. "Don't get up! Goodby. I'll come to see you tomorrow. Don't be in the least disturbed. Baron Dangloss has his instructions." Impulsively giving him her hand, which he respectfully raised to his lips, she followed Aunt Fanny and was gone.

Almost immediately Baldos was requested to present himself before Baron Dangloss in the adjoining room. Refusing to be carried in, he resolutely strode through the door and stood before the grim old captain of police, an easy, confident smile on his face. The black patch once more covered his eye with defiant assertiveness.

"They tell me you are Baldos, a goat hunter," said Baron Dangloss, eying him keenly.

"Yes."

"And you were hurt in defending one who is of much consequence in Graustark. Sit down, my good fellow." Baldos eye gleamed coldly for an instant; then he sank into a chair. "While admitting that you have done Graustark a great service, I am obliged to tell you that I at least know you to be other than what you say. You are not a goat hunter, and Baldos is not your name. Am I not right?"

"You have had instructions from your sovereign, Baron Dangloss, or they include a command to cross question me?" asked Baldos haughtily. Dangloss hesitated for a full minute.

"They did not. I take the liberty of inquiring on my own responsibility."

"Very well, sir. Until you have a right to question me, I am Baldos and a goat hunter. I think I am here to receive surgical treatment."

"You decline to tell me anything concerning yourself?"

"Only that I am injured and need relief."

"Perhaps I know more about you than you suspect, sir."

"I am not in the least interested, Baron Dangloss, in what you know. The princess brought me into Ganiook, and I have her promise of her royal protection while here. That is all I have to say, except that I have implicit faith in her word."

Dangloss kept watching him in silence for some time. No one but himself knew what was going on in that shrewd, speculative mind. At length he arose and approached the proud fellow in rags.

"You have earned every consideration at our hands. My men will take you to the hospital, and you shall have the best of care. You have served our princess well. Tomorrow you may feel inclined to talk more freely with me, for I am your friend, Baldos."

"I am grateful for that, Baron Dangloss," said the other simply. Then he was led away, and a comfortable cot in the Ganiook hospital soon held his long, feverish frame, while capable hands took care of his wounds. He did not know it, but two fully armed soldiers maintained a careful guard outside his door under instructions from the head of the police. Moreover, a picked detail of men sallied forth into the lower pass in search of the goat hunter's followers.

In the meantime Beverly was conducted to the home of the Countess Rallowitz. Her meeting with the princess was most affectionate. There were tears, laughter and kisses. The whole atmosphere of the place suggested romance to the eager American girl. Downstairs were the royal guards. In the halls were soldiers. All about were maidservants and obsequious lackeys, crowding the home of the kindly countess. At last, completely worn out by the fatigue of travel, the two friends sat down to a dainty meal.

"Oh, I am so delighted," murmured Beverly for the hundredth time.

"I'm appalled when I think of the dangers you incurred in coming to me. Only one here very foolish American girl could have undertaken such a trip as this. Dear me, Beverly, I should have died if anything dreadful had happened to you. Why did you not have questioned the princess. And then they laughed joyously.

"And you went all the way to St. Petersburg to meet me, you dear, dear Yetive!" cried Beverly so warmly that the attentive servant forgot his mask of reverence.

"Wasn't it ridiculous of me? I know Gren would have forbidden it if he had been in Edelweiss when I started. And, more shame to me, the poor fellow is doubtless at the conference with Dawsbergen, utterly ignorant of my escapade. You should have heard the ambassador's wrath"— And the princess paused for an English word.

"Rich?" Beverly supplied.

"Yes. They objected violently. And, do you know, I was finally compelled to issue a private edict to restrain them from sending an appeal to Grenfall way off there on the frontier. Whether or no, my uncle insisted that he should be brought home, a three days' journey, in order that he might have no excuse for coming to Ganiook. Of course they could not disobey my edict, and so poor Gren is none the wiser, unless he has returned from the conference. I left Lorry in charge and on the way to Ganiook at this very minute."

"What a wholesale ruler you are!" cried Beverly. "Issuing everything, sensible just to rush off hundreds of miles to meet me! And Axphain is trying to capture you too! Goodness, you must love me!"

"Oh, but I did have a trifling affair of state to lay before the czar, my dear. Tomorrow we shall see him, and send in the cards, and it will all be very much worth while. You see, Bev-

"A transitory emotion, your highness, that is all," said he, but his hand trembled as he folded the paper.

CHAPTER X.

BRIGHT and early the next morning the party was ready for the last of the journey to Edelweiss. Less than twenty miles separated Ganiook from the capital, and the road was in excellent condition. Beverly Calhoun, tired and exhausted, had slept soundly until aroused by the princess herself. Their rooms adjoined each other, and when Yetive, shortly after daybreak, stole into the American girl's chamber Beverly was sleeping so sweetly that the intruder would have retreated had it not been for the boisterous shouts of stable boys in the courtyard below the windows. She hurried to a window and looked out upon the gray cloaked morning. Postilions and stable boys were congregated near the gates, tormenting a ragged old man who clung desperately to one of the huge posts. In some curiosity, she called Beverly from her slumbers, urging the sleepy one to hasten to the window.

The weather was fresh even, and the tormentors in the court below were astonished by the sound of a woman's voice coming, as it were, from the clouds. Sixteen pairs of eyes were turned upward; the commotion ended suddenly. In the window above stood two grave, white robed figures. The sun, still far below the ridge of mountains, had not yet robbed the morning of the gray, dewy shadows that belong to it only.

"What are you doing to that poor old man?" cried Yetive, and it was the first time any of them had seen anger in the princess' face. They slunk back in dismay. "Let him alone! You, Gartz, see that he has food and drink, and without delay. Report to me later on, and explain, if you can, why you have conducted yourselves in so unbecoming a manner." Then the window was closed, and the princess found herself in the warm arms of her friend.

"I couldn't understand a word you said, Yetive, but I knew you were giving it to them hot and heavy. And you see how nicely old Franz bowed to you? Goodness, his head almost touched the ground."

"He was bowing to you, Beverly. You forgot that you are the princess to him."

"Isn't that funny? I had quite forgotten it. The poor old goose!"

Later, when the coaches and escort were drawn up in front of the Rallowitz palace ready for the start, the princess called the chief postilion, Gartz, to the step of her coach.

"I have learned the meaning of the disturbance I witnessed this morning?" she demanded.

Gartz hung his head. "We thought the man was crazy, your highness. He had been telling us such monstrous lies," he mumbled.

"Are you sure they were lies?"

"Oh, quite sure, your highness. They were laughable. He said, for one thing, that it was he who drove your highness' coach into Ganiook last evening, when everybody knows that I had full charge of the coach and horses."

"You are very much mistaken, Gartz," she said distinctly. He blinked his eyes.

"Your highness," he gasped, "you surely remember"—

"Enough, sir. Franz drove the princess into Ganiook last night. He says so himself, does he not?"

"Yes, your highness," murmured poor Gartz.

"What more did he say to you?"

"He said he had come from the master, who is in the hospital, to inquire after your health and to bear his thanks for the kindnesses you have secured for him. He said the master is faring well and is satisfied to remain where he is. Also, he said that the master was sending him back into the mountains to warn his friends that he is safe and to bear a certain message of cheer to them, sent forth by the princess. It was all so foolish and crazy, your highness, that we could but glee and laugh at the poor creature."

"It is you who have been foolish, sir. Send the old man to me."

"He has gone, your highness," in frightened tones.

"So much the better," said the princess, dismissing him with a wave of the hand. Gartz went away in a daze, and for days he took every opportunity to look for other signs of mental derangement in the conduct of his mistress, at the same time indulging in speculation as to his own soundness of mind.

Ganiook's population, fired by the chief functionaries, awaiting the departure of the princess, although the hour was early. Beverly peered forth curiously as the coach rolled off. The quaint, half oriental costumes of the townspeople, the odd little children, the bright colors, the perfect love and reverence that shone in the faces of the multitude impressed her deeply. She was never to forget that picturesque morning.

Baron Dangloss rode beside the coach until it passed through the southern gates and into the countryside. A squadron of cavalry acted as escort. The bright red trousers and top boots, with the deep blue jackets, reminded Beverly more than ever of the soldiers of Napoleon's time that she had at home. There was a dense, dark cloud in the faces of these soldiers, however, that removed any suggestion of play. Their bearing was severely martial, almost too opposed to the romantic side of her nature. Everything seemed so unreal and so like the fairy book, that Beverly presently found herself thrusting that book behind the screen. There was no room for it in the coach, and it would be two days before she would see it again.

"Oh, I love your soldiers," cried Beverly warmly.

"Poor fellows, who knows how soon they may be called upon to face death in the Dawsbergen hills?" said Yetive, a shadow crossing her face.

Dangloss was to remain in Ganiook for several days, on grand general manifestations by the Axphainians. A corps of spies and scouts was working with him, and couriers were constantly riding at full speed between the city and the castle in Edelweiss. Before they parted Beverly extracted a renewal of his promise to take good care of Baldos. She sent a message to the injured man, deploring the fact that she was compelled to leave Ganiook without seeing him as she had promised. It was her intention to have him come to Edelweiss as soon as he was in condition to be removed, Baron Dangloss smiled mysteriously, but he had no comment to make. He had received his orders and was obeying them to the letter.

"I wonder if Grenfall has heard of my harum-scarum trip to St. Petersburg," reflected Yetive, making herself comfortable in the coach after the start and the multitudes were far behind.

"I'll go you a box of chocolate creams that we meet him before we get to Edelweiss," ventured Beverly.

"Agreed," said the princess.

"Don't say 'agreed,' dear. 'Done' is the word," corrected the American girl airily.

Beverly won. Grenfall Lorry and a small company of horsemen rode up in furious haste long before the sun was in mid-sky. An attempt to depict the scene between him and his venturesome wife would be a hopeless task. The way in which the face expelled its sternness and worry was a joy in itself. To use his own words, he breathed freely for the first time in hours. The princess' tale, told in the ear of the officer who rode beside the coach, and the trio kept up an eager, interesting conversation during the next two hours.

It was a warm, sleepy day, but all signs of drowsiness disappeared with the advent of Lorry. He had reached Edelweiss late the night before, after a three days' ride from the conference in Dawsbergen. At first he encountered trouble in trying to discover what had become of the princess. Those at the castle were aware of the fact that she had reached Ganiook safely and sought to put him off with subterfuges. He stormed in such a degree, however, that their object failed. The result was that he was off for Ganiook with the earliest light of day.

Regarding the conference with Prince Gabriel's representatives, he had but little to say. The escaped murderer naturally was not mentioned. He came to all appearances quite firmly established in power once more. Lorry's only hope was that the reversal of feeling in Dawsbergen might cause him to slay the prince. He was carrying affairs with a high hand, dealing vengeful blows to the friends of his hated brother and ensconcement that, sooner or later, must prove his undoing. His representatives at the conference were an arrogant, law defying set of men who laughed scornfully at every proposal made by the Graustarkians.

"We told them that if he were not surrendered to our government within sixty days we would declare war and go down and take him," concluded the American.

"Two months!" cried Yetive, "I don't understand."

"There was method in that ultimatum, Axphain, of course, will set up a howl, but as soon forcefully as we get on the Princess Volga may undertake. Naturally one might suspect that we should declare war at once, inasmuch as he would be taken sooner or later, but here is the point: Before two months have elapsed the better element of Dawsbergen will be organized with the new duke of Gabriel that it will do anything to avert a war on his account. We have led them to believe that Axphain will have naught if not physical support to our cause. Give them two months in which to get over this tremendous hysteria and they'll find that Gabriel isn't worth it, you see, and down in their hearts they know it. They really loved young Dantan, who seems to be a devil of a good fellow. If the paper we head that in six weeks they'll be wishing he were back on the throne again. And just to think of it, Yetive, dear, you were almost there in the very heart of Axphain risking everything!" he cried, wiping the moisture from his brow.

"It is just eleven days since I left Edelweiss, and I have had a lovely journey," she said, with one of her rare smiles. He shook his head gravely, and she resolved in her heart never to give him another such cause for alarm.

"And in the meantime, Mr. Grenfall Lorry, you are blaming me and hating me and all that for long the real cause of your wife's escapade," said Beverly Calhoun plaintively. "I'm awfully sorry. But you must remember, her own little heart did not put her up to this ridiculous trip. She did it of her own free will and accord. Besides, I am the one who is to blame, the lion and all that for being

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

To the Editor of The Beaver:

Dear Sir,—Will you kindly grant me space to refer to the letter in the "Statepayer" in your issue of last Friday?

My name was placed on the solid ballot "Citizens' Ticket" absolutely, without my consent or knowledge. I was not even approached by anyone in reference to allowing my name to be placed on the said list, nor had I stated to any one that I should be a candidate for any office.

I think I speak otherwise of this or any other ticket I expressed no opinion but I wish to state distinctly, that I am not, nor shall I be, a member of any ticket. If I accept nomination for any office, I shall ask the electors to judge my conduct on its own merits and pronounce accordingly.

Yours truly,
T. J. SIMPSON.

NO OPIUM IN CHAMBERLAIN'S COUGH REMEDY.

There is not the least danger in giving Chamberlain's Cough Remedy to small children as it contains no opium or other harmful drug. The body of Robert Lowey was found on the Radial Railway near Hamilton, after grave suspicions that he was murdered.

The Divisional Court allowed the appeal of Dr. Alexander Creelman from the ruling of the Medical Council striking his name from the roll of physicians.

The fuel situation in Brandon has become very serious. Some of the schools have been compelled to close, and there are many householders entirely without fuel.

Robert George Mulley, a Deseronto resident, aged about forty-three years and a brother of W. H. Mulley, the well-known druggist of Deseronto, was killing a small deer in the Belleville rifle mills, when his clothing caught and he was whirled about breaking a leg and arm. He died on Sunday night.

Bay View House, the residence of Colonel Rathbun, Deseronto, was totally destroyed by fire Wednesday afternoon. The fire was discovered about 1 o'clock, and in less than an hour the house was completely destroyed. The contents were mostly saved. Colonel and Mrs. Rathbun were both out of town.

A carload of express packages, which left Toronto for the west on Monday, was destroyed by fire between that city and North Bay. The car contained a considerable quantity of goods for Winnipeg and other points in Manitoba and the West. This is the third carload of express goods consigned for the west that has been destroyed by fire during the past month. The origin of the fires is not known.

THE RIGHT PLACE.

Of beautiful furs that catch my eye,
To make a purchase I intend to try,
To be perfectly sure of the price being low,
To the right place I must go.

In numerous establishments only I want to go,
In this district of course there are others I know,
But first, and compare with George Mills & Co.,

ODESSA.

Dr. C. C. Nash will not be in Odessa Xmas day or Monday, 24th and 25th, they Dec. 26th, 1906, and Jan. 2d, 1907.

On Thursday and Friday evenings of last week the Town Hall was crowded to witness the Xmas entertainments were given in the Town Hall, on Thursday evening by the Methodist's moving picture show. The Passion Play was only five reeled. The hall was well filled. Good order prevailed and enough to win an encore. A subject, "Up to Date," the Middletown parade was shown; also several comic pictures which created hearty laughter. Altogether a pleasant time was spent. Half of the proceeds were to go on furtherance of the Middletown orders.

On Friday evening the Xmas concert will be given in the town hall. The programme will be made up of home talent. We venture to say it will be well worth attending. So come one, come all, and you will get your money's worth.

Council met on the 15th inst., to revise the business of 1906. Quite a hot time in session, as is usual when the fierce and demon reeve, Mrs. Herchmer, of Maple Avenue, over 92 years, is visiting her daughter, Mrs. Eli Snider, for a few days or weeks. For so old a lady she is exceedingly smart and well.

Mrs. Hubbell, of Bellev lle, and Mrs. Pringle, of Napanee, are here visiting at Mr. B. G. Hamm's.

Mrs. Thomas Thrasher, of Kingston, is spending a few days with her.

Mrs. Wm. Hamm is visiting cousin at Walter Snider's child.

Sunday next as this is the second Sunday within a year, in this home, we extend our sincerest sympathy to Mr. and Mrs. Snider.

Mr. Manford Montgomery wedded one of Verona's fairest maidens on Wednesday. We wish them happiness.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Sharpe, of Napanee, spent a week at her aunt's, Mrs. W. A. Baker.

Miss Lily Lee is home from Toronto with the measles. Mr. and Mrs. R. Lee.

Skating is the pastime indulged in by the youths. The streets are in an icy condition.

BATH.

Fix up your bath room.- Treat yourself to a nickle Towel Bar or a Glass one, to a plated Soap or Sponge Holder, all new goods, at Boyle & Son's.

Dr. C. C. Nash has discontinued his Island trip on Thursday, and is not at home every day but Tuesday and Wednesday, when he is at his office. Don't attempt spending a few days at New Years, but come to Bath and have a few old home in Athens.

Mr. Norman Lee, manager of the Crown Bank here, has been transferred to the same position at Bowmanville. Mr. Lee has been Legg, of Ottawa, has been appointed to the position. Mr. Legg arrived here last week.

The Methodist Sunday School here rendered a beautiful Xmas concert on Christmas evening. The programme is being prepared. Dr. Dewart will deliver cold weather, the boy has frozen ears.

The ice supply seems to be the great question of the day. Each day the great appetite of Z. Mills for ice is added. Everybody, farmers and all others from all parts of the country, come to Bath for your ice.

Mr. Stanley Purdy, who has been attending Queen's University, Kingston, is also spending his holidays at his father's, Mr. F. D. Purdy.

Owing to the ice, the rec. Athens did not play the final game of the season of this week.

Mr. Manford Giles, who is attending the college in Belleville, is also spending his holidays at his home here.

Mr. W. W. Anderson is home from Toronto.

CITIZENS' TICKET

To The Editor of the Napanee Beaver:

Dear Sir,—On Monday, the thirty-first day of December, the ratepayers of Napanee will proceed to elect and nominate the Town Council and Electric Light Commissioners, including a Reeve to represent the town in the County Council for the year 1907.

As it has been the custom in the past to call no public meeting until nomination night and at the last moment select the candidates for the several offices in the gift of the electors of the town, a number of the ratepayers have interested themselves in trying to get the consent of suitable candidates to offer themselves for the different positions. The following gentlemen have kindly consented to stand for election: Mr. W. T. Waller, Mayor; Mr. J. Frank Chalmers, Reeve; Mr. J. H. Difoe, Electric Light Commissioner; Mr. F. Miller, Electric Light Commissioner; Mr. S. Casey Dickson, Councillor; Mr. C. A. Graham, Councillor; Dr. Simpson, Councillor; Mr. Patrick Gleason, Councillor; Dr. Stratton, Councillor, and when you consider the personnel of the ticket prepared by the citizens and ratepayers, you, we feel, will agree with us that they would make a very strong and satisfactory Council and Commission for the coming year.

Mr. W. T. Waller has had four years' experience in the Town Council, and has done excellent work as chairman of some of the most important committees.

Mr. J. Frank Chalmers will be an invaluable man to look after the interests of the Town in the new County Council, when every municipality is reading its best and most experienced man to represent it for the year 1907. Mr. Chalmers has had several years' experience as County Councillor and as Reeve of the Township of Adolphustown before coming to Napanee and has acted as Township Clerk for that Township.

Both of these gentlemen will bring to the town business experience and integrity and you would make an estimable Reeve for the Town.

Mr. J. H. Difoe is well known to the electors as one of the most enterprising business men and is an experienced mill-wright and has been papers as a first class stationary engineer and therefore has the mechanical knowledge and ability to protect our valuable electric light plant.

Mr. F. P. Miller, the other Commissioner, is one of our most prominent citizens, a Civil Engineer with his qualifications for the position we recommend, is, to-day, the best posted man on electric light in the town. Both these gentlemen are so valuable to the interests of the Town in connection with the Electric Light that they should be elected by acclamation, and it would be a terrible sacrifice that such men to be defeated, as it does, a large amount of time and trouble.

For the Council we have Mr. S. Casey Dickson, who has lived in the town over nine his boyhood and has grown the confidence, year by year, of the general public. He is one of our most enterprising merchants and we feel that a business man is more common with every other ratepayer in Napanee. Given experience in the affairs of the town has been in the most successful manner and with the energy and ability, which he has displayed in the business affairs of his own, he has made affairs of our beautiful town, his presence in the Council, one of the greatest importance.

Mr. C. A. Graham, who has been a member of the Council, and who, although passing through a severe illness during this year, is still fully qualified to act on the Council, has a record for work which shows his business ability and which justifies his re-election to office.

Dr. Simpson has done good work as Chairman of the Board of Health, and has been a man not afraid of his opinion, and one of whom the town is greatly advocated what he considered to be the best interests of the town, not owing to his efforts mainly during the last year the Bay Bay ferry has been completed and put in commission. In fact the Doctor has always been one of our most enterprising and public spirited men.

Mr. Patrick Gleason should be very valuable addition to the Council as he has had several years' experience in the routine work of the Council and is a good business man of first class interests in Napanee and one who will have the greatest confidence in, in the same important position as Councillor.

Dr. Stratton has kindly consented to stand for Councillor. He has had a long experience of the public work of the Town Council, as he acted for a number of years on the Board of Health and is one of our new additions to the town, he has a great many friends, and as he is willing to give his valuable services for our benefit, we feel that, if they, not miss the opportunity to elect them.

In submitting these names as the nomination of a very large number of the ratepayers of, of course, I am representing any other gentlemen may be nominated on the floor of the meeting, but those I have mentioned have been selected by us as being the representative of this ticket, but we do not wish to be understood that we are the ratepayers interested have been consulted, that should be the most satisfactory, and therefore, I am only acting for myself in this matter, but I feel sure that those I have mentioned will be endorsed by every ratepayer who is desirous of placing the management of our affairs in the hands of men who will be capable and honest to do what they can for the gentlemen we have nominated.

Yours truly,
A RATEPAYER.

REPLY TO RATEPAYER.

Mr Editor,—A short time ago a letter appeared in your paper suggesting a meeting of the citizens of the Town with a view of discussing municipal matters, and selecting a ticket to be placed on candidates for the forthcoming elections.

The advantages of such a meeting are apparent. It would avoid hasty and ill-considered action, and would give time for consideration before and above all, it would tend to stamp out and put a stop to rings and cacuses. That is the object of "A Ratepayer," as I do not know who "A Ratepayer" is I do not feel disposed to write him and advocated holding a meeting. I was just such a man as would scorn any ring or cacus, but would scorn also going to discuss the merits or qualifications of the gentlemen whose names appear upon the ticket of the "ring." As it, evidently, is to them and they announced over their own signatures that they approve the method of selection, and that they intend to accept nomination, what would be the use of such meeting? If I was for the public good, why not put in it? Who called the meeting? Who has taken it to grind "A Ratepayer" who with his little pencil made up this ticket and sent it to Council to be above reproach, to trickle in the Town? The able communication appended to the obituary notices appeared to be very flattering. The ordinary citizen would have grave fears that so much praise would be wrapped up in such a devil's brew as this.

Now, Sir, Editor, are the people of this town to submit to this sort of dictation from the President of the Star Chamber? It would be a good time for the citizens to meet and discuss municipal politics before nominations, but no greater curse could befall this Town than to yield for one moment to the usurpation of a self-appointed body of men, and among gentlemen who prepared this ticket have already been responsible for more than one municipal muddle and a financial muddle in the affairs of the Town. The men that have been selected will not wield, if they repudiate all connect on with this ring. The Star Chamber comes one of the Star Chamber are endorsed by a number of ratepayers, the citizens would like to know who those ratepayers are. "A Ratepayer" says the ticket is "prepared by the citizens and ratepayers." How? How? Who are they? No self-respecting candidate will permit his name to go before the public under such circumstances. A number of the gentlemen whose names appear upon the ticket have in private expressed their disgust at the manner in which they are introduced to the public. It is up to all of them to repudiate the "Star Chambers" and "secret committees," and if they wish to run for any office come out in the full light and not hide in the shadow of "A Ratepayer's" little list.

No simpler method could be adopted to secure the defeat of a card date than that adopted by "A Ratepayer." The electors of Napanee are not fools or dubs as to be led about by their noses; nor are they puppets to dance to the fiddle of any meddlesome self-appointed dictator.

The electors are able to sit up and take notice of things, and they are doing so, and it's useless for "A Ratepayer" to attempt to hoodwink them by posing as a public benefactor. The sooner he and his should see us now the better.

Yours truly,
ELSTON.

STRUCK BY A HOT BOLT.

PECULIAR ACCIDENT TO AN ENGINEMAN.

Edward Spencer, chief engineer of the S.S. "Gil dec," of Montreal, was working around his engine when a bolt fell flew out and burned his shoulder by. It was as if a red-hot spit had been thrust into it. The pain was intense but a supply of Zam-Buk balm was speedily obtained and first aid rendered. The fragrant balm alleviated the pain, and to the surprise of Spencer, and his friends, at the end of a week the wound was completely healed. This is only one of several cases reported recently in which Zam-Buk has been found a wonderful healer of burns, scalds, bruises and sunburn, cuts, sores, open wounds, scalp sores, and blood-poisoning, no matter how long these have existed. Mrs. W. H. Tyrrell had a little boy, Cecil, who had a bad scalp sore about as big as a dollar on the face. He had for four years, and hardly a night during that time but he had applied cold cream or some ointment or other, but it would always be worse in the warmer the weather the worse it got. Finally Mrs. Tyrrell tried Zam-Buk and in about a week's time the sore had disappeared completely.

One of the world's greatest scalpels says the healing power of Zam-Buk is due to its wonderful combination of which it is composed. It is also a germicide, and is unequalled for speedy cure. Zam-Buk is so antiseptic that its application is more effective than that of many other and cruder remedies. For all skin ailments, such as blood-poisoning, abscesses, eczema, ringworm, ulcers, etc., Zam-Buk is unequalled. Sold by all druggists and stores at 50c. box, or post free from Zam-Buk Co., Toronto, for price. Don't accept any substitute. Write the name and date of this paper across the article you require.

Deafness Cannot be Cured.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness, caused by Catarrh, that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars free.

H. J. WOOD, Newburgh

To the Electors of Ernestown

Ladies and Gentlemen,—Since announcing my candidature for Reeve of your County and Township, I have been waited upon by the best men of the township, and not only those who support me, but numerous others say plainly that it is your purpose to put a good reliable man in the chair, step up and out of the way. In the past we are pleased to say that the County Council of 1906 has handled our money in a legal manner, and believe a change would only prove detrimental to the interests of the County. We say that the rate for 1905 was too low by at least $1,000, and we had to pay $700 the balance due on Sharpe's bridge, in order to carry out the law. In the next hundred years, the first of the present century, I also will say on the County Council, with a view to economy of the management of our affairs, that we have not spent over $1,100 more on the County than we did in 1905, and the new school law has also increased our taxes. Now I ask you if we now a more reliable statement than is formed in the above? I would that we have done more for the poor, and also increased the bonus on roads, but we have had to build 2,300 square feet of grade crossing, which is a costly job and one that is also dangerous. A few things I will tell you I do not intend to do. One is to interfere with when you get it come and treat what we have to pay. In conclusion I am confident I am entitled to your votes and influence, and I promise my best services for the year 1907

Yours, ever faithfully,
L. L. GALLAGHER.

Rheumatism

I have found a tried and tested cure for Rheumatism! Not a remedy that will straighten the distorted limbs of chronic cripples, nor turn bony growths back to flesh again. That is impossible. But I can now surely kill the pains and pangs of this deplorable disease.

In Germany—with a Chemist in the City of Dresden—I found out last Ingredient with which Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Remedy was made a perfected, dependable prescription. Without that last Ingredient, I mercifully fruited many, many cases of Rheumatism: but now, at last, thumfornly cures all curable cases of this heretofore much dreaded disease. Those stand like granular wastes, found in Rheumatic Blood, seem to dissolve and pass away under the action of this remedy as freely as does sugar when added to pure water. And then, when dissolved, these poisonous wastes freely pass from the system, and the cause of Rheumatism is gone forever. There is now no real need—no actual excuse to suffer longer without help. We tell, and in confidence recommend

By Geo. Barr McCutcheon

Author of "Graustark."

Copyright, 1904, by Dodd, Mead & Co.

"I'm not afraid of him," boasted Beverly, but there came a time when she thought of those words with a shudder.

By the way, Yetive, I have had word from Harry Anguish. He and the countess will leave Paris this week, if the baby's willing, and will be in Edelweiss soon. You don't know how it relieves me to know that Harry will be with us at this time."

Yetive's eyes answered his enthusiasm. Both had a warm and grateful memory of the loyal service which the young American had rendered his friend when they had first come to Graustark in quest of the princess, and both had a great regard for his wife, the Countess Dagmar, who as Yetive's lady in waiting had been through all the perils of those exciting days with them.

As they drew near the gates of Edelweiss a large body of horsemen rode forth to meet them. The afternoon was well on the way to night, and the air of the valley was cool and refreshing despite the rays of the June sun.

"Edelweiss at last," murmured Beverly, her face aglow. "The heart of Graustark. Do you know that I have been brushing up on my grammar? I have learned the meaning of the word 'Graustark,' and it seems so appropriate. 'Grau' is gray, hoary, old; 'stark' is strong. Old and strong, isn't it, dear?"

"And here rides the oldest and strongest man in all Graustark—the Iron Count of Marlanx," said Yetive, looking down the road. "See; the strange gray man in front there is our greatest general, our greatest fighter, our most heartless warrior. Does he not look like the eagle or the hawk?"

A moment later the parties met, and the newcomers swung into line with the escort. Two men rode up to the carriage and saluted. One was Count Marlanx, the other Colonel Quinnox of the royal guard. The count, lean and gray as a wolf, revealed rows of huge white teeth in his perfunctory smile of welcome, while young Quinnox's face fairly beamed with honest joy. In the past that he held he was but following in the footsteps of his forefathers. Since history began in Graustark a Quinnox had been in charge of the castle guard.

The "Iron Count," as he sometimes was called, was past his sixtieth year. For twenty years he had been in command of the army. One had but to look at his strong, aquiline face to know that he was a fearless leader, a savage fighter. His eyes were black, piercing and never quiet; his hair and close cropped beard were almost snow white; his voice was sheep and without a vestige of warmth. Since her babyhood Yetive had stood in awe of this grim old warrior, who was so uncommon thing for mothers to subdue disobedient children with the threat to give them over to the Iron Count. "Old Marlanx will get you if you're not good," was a household phrase in Edelweiss. He had been married five times, and as many times had he been left a widower. If he were disconsolate in any instance, no one had been able to discover the fact. Enormously rich, as riches go in Graustark, he had found young women for his wives who thought only of his gold and his lands in the trade they made with Cupid. It was said that without exception they died happy in the days of joy. The fortress overlooking the valley to the south was no more rugged and unyielding than the man who made his home within its walls. He lived there from choice, and it was with his own money that he fitted up the commandant's quarters in truly regal style. Power was more to him than wealth, though he enjoyed both.

Colonel Quinnox brought news from the castle. Yetive's uncle and aunt, the Count and Countess Halford, were eagerly expecting her return, and the city was preparing to manifest its joy in the most exuberant fashion. As they drew near the gates the shouts of the people came to the ears of the travelers. Then the boom of cannon and the blare of bands broke upon the grounds. The gates stood wide open and inviting. Inside was Jacob Fraasch, the chief steward of the grounds, with his men drawn up in line just under the walls the sentries came to parade rest; on the plaza the royal band was playing as though by inspiration. Then the gates closed behind the coach and escort, and Beverly Calhoun was safe inside the castle walls. The Iron Count handed her from the carriage at the portals of the palace, and she stood as one in a dream.

CHAPTER XI.

THE two weeks following Beverly Calhoun's advent into the royal household were filled with joy and gladness. Daily she sent glowing letters to her father, mother and brothers in Washington, elaborating vastly upon the paradise into which she had fallen. To her highly emotional mind the praises of Graustark had been but poorly sung. The huge castle, with its towers and bastions and portcullises, impressed her with a never ending sense of wonder. Its great halls and stairways, its chapel, the throne room and the armor closet; its underground passages and dungeons all united to fill her imaginative soul with the richest, rarest joys of romance. Simple American girl that she was, unused to the rigorous etiquette of royalty, she found embarrassment in the first confusion of events, but she was not long in recovering her poise.

Her apartments were near those of the Princess Yetive. In the private intercourse enjoyed by these young women all manner of restraint was abandoned by the visitor and every vestige of royalty slipped from the princess. Count Halford and his adorable wife, the Countess Yvonne, both of whom had grown old in the court, found the girl and her strange servant a source of wonder and delight.

Some days after Beverly's arrival there came to the castle Harry Anguish and his wife, the vivacious Dagmar. With them came the year-old cooing babe who was to overthrow the heart and head of every being in the household from princess down. The tiny Dagmar became queen at once, and no one disputed her rule.

Anguish the painter became Anguish the strategist and soldier. He planned with Lorry and the ministry, advancing some of the most harebrained projects that ever encouraged discussion in a solemn conclave. The staid, cautious ministers looked upon him with wonder, but so plausible did he make his proposals appear that they were forced to consider them seriously. The old Count of Marlanx held him in great disdain and did not hesitate to expose his contempt. This did not disturb Anguish in the least, for he was as optimistic as the sunshine. His plan for the recapture of Gabriel was ridiculously improbable, but it was afterward seen that had it been attempted much distress and delay might actually have been avoided.

Yetive and Beverly, with Dagmar and the baby, made merry while the men were in council. Their mornings were spent in the shady park surrounding the castle, their afternoons in driving, riding and walking. Oftentimes the princess was barred from these simple pleasures by the exigencies of her position. She was obliged to grant audiences, observe certain customs of state, attend to the charities that came directly under her supervision and confer with the nobles on affairs of weight and importance. Beverly delighted in the throne room and the underground passages. They signified more to her than all the rest. She was shown the room in which Lorry had foiled the Vermese who once tried to abduct Yetive. The dungeon where Gabriel spent his first days of confinement, the tower in which Lorry had held Yetive a prisoner and the mountains in the clouds were all places of unusual interest to her.

Some of the people of the city began to recognize the fair American girl who was a guest in the castle, and a certain amount of homage was paid to her. When she rode or drove in the streets with her attendant soldiers, the people bowed as deeply and as respectfully as they did to the princess herself, and Beverly was just as gracious and gracious as if she had been born with a scepter in her hand.

The soft moonlight nights charmed her with a sense of rapture never known before. With the castle brilliantly illuminated, the halls and drawing rooms filled with gaily dressed men and women at their posts, the military band playing in the parade ground, the balconies and porches offering their most inviting entertainment, it was wonder that Beverly was entranced. War had no terrors for her. If she thought of it at all it was with the fear that it might disturb the dream into which she had fallen. True, there was little or nothing to distress the most timid in these first days. The controversy between the principalities was at a standstill, although there was not an hour in which preparations for the worst were neglected. To Beverly Calhoun it meant little when sentiment was laid aside. To Yetive and her people this probable war with Dawsbergen meant everything.

Dangloss, going back and forth between Edelweiss and the frontier north of Ganlook, where the best of the police secret service watched with the sleepless eyes of the lynx, brought unsettling news to the ministry. Axphain troops were engaged in the annual maneuvers just across the border in their own territory. Usually these were held in the plains near the capital, but there were rumors of reinforcements in the fact that this year they were being carried on in the rough southern extremity of the principality within a day's march of the Graustark line, fully two months earlier than usual. The doughty baron reported that four large field artillery were engaged in the drills, and that fully 8,000 men were massed in the south of Axphain. The fortifications of Ganlook, Lebbot and other towns in northern Graustark were strengthened with almost the same care as those in the north, where conflict with Dawsbergen might first be expected. General Manlanx and his staff rested neither day nor night. The army of Graustark was ready. Underneath the castle's gay exterior there smoldered the fire of battle, the tremor of defiance.

Late one afternoon Beverly Calhoun and Mrs. Anguish drove up in state to the Tower, wherein eat Dangloss and his watchdogs. The scowl left his face as far as nature would permit, and he welcomed the ladies warmly.

"I came to ask about my friend, the goat hunter," said Beverly, her cheeks a trifle redder than usual.

ZULU WAR TACTICS.

Method of Attack With the Crescent Formation.

Zulu military tactics are associated with the name of Tyaka, the ruthless Zulu conqueror, who welded into the stock of the Amazulu, the people of the heavens, all the young men of the various tribes he conquered, incorporating them into regiments and thus building up a powerful military nation. Yet it was to Dingiswayo, the wanderer, that the inception was due. This man, the son of the chief of the Umtetwa, was driven into exile in consequence of an abortive plot to seize the reins of power.

During that exile he lived in Cape Colony and saw the military methods of the British. With instinctive genius he saw how the idea could be adapted to his own nation, and on his return to succession to the chieftainship he divided his people into regiments, distinguishing them by names and by a special color of shield for each regiment, though for a time they retained the umkonto, or throwing assagai, as their chief weapon. He heard the great cue made by the British infantry of their favorite weapon, the bayonet, and so he replaced the umkonto by the ikwa, or broad bladed stabbing assagai.

The peculiarity of the Zulu tactics has earned it the name of the crescent formation for attack, and it is noteworthy that, broadly speaking, it was the method employed by the Boers in their invasion of Natal and adopted by Lord Roberts in his advance through Orange River Colony, and it was the fear of its success which kept the Boers continually on the run. The best thing with which to compare it is the spread of the stag headed beetle. Horns are thrown out widely on either flank, while the main body forms the head itself. From the main body a small force is detached to engage the enemy while the horns creep around the flanks.

This force in the days of Tyaka was reserved until the right moment of the command, "Go, sons of Zulu, go and return no more," and death at the hands of their fellows was the fate of those who returned. While this force was holding the enemy the horns carried their task if possible, and as soon as the two horns had met in the rear of the enemy the head or chest was launched upon the position, and the prophet says that the whole force of the foe tasted the assagai, for in war no quarter was given or asked.

Singular and Plural.

It is a question of taste and fancy whether one should make two bites of a cherry, but we all really make two bites of the word "cherry" when we use it in the singular. The original English version of "cerise" was "cherise" or "chiris," which was mistaken for a plural, so that "cheri" or "chiri" was soon manufactured as a singular. Exactly as has "pea" come into being as a false singular obtained from the supposed plural and true singular "pease." "Cherry" for "cherris" is another case, but "cherry" and "cherries," or "chiris" and "chirises

Forty-five Coats for Girls and Women on Sale Thursday, $5.00.

Here's a snap in Coats for women and girls. A manufacturer let us have a lot of sample coats at a low price. We have taken those and sa dwiched a few broken lines from our regular stock. Forty-five coats in all, to be sold Thursday, Dec. 27th, $5.00. Every coat in the bunch is new this season, made from good serviceable tweeds, cheviots, and cloths. Sizes run 14 yrs., 16 yrs., 18 yrs., and 32 to 44. Sale will not start till 10 o'clock Thursday morning, and to be sure of getting what you want be on hand promptly. Regular prices were up to 9.40. A few capes will be added to the sale lot, mostly blacks, values up to 10.00, choice for 5.00, same as coats.

Furs.

There are a lot of Furs being sold this week, and there's a good reason for it. Can you imagine any article which is more acceptable as a gift than a Fur? We are receiving new furs every day to keep pace with the demand. A very large selection still to choose from.

Sable Ruffs	at from	$8.50	to $35.00
" Muffs	"	10.00	to 18.00
White Thibett Ruffs		5.00	to 10.00
" Muffs		6.00	to 8.50

Also a great variety of Coon Sable, American Opposum, Isabella Fox, with muffs to match.

We have just received a large assortment of Collarettes and Caperines at from 3.50 to 12.50. Some of the best values we have ever shown.

Don't forget that we have an almost unlimited range of children's neck furs, collars, caps and gauntlets, and at prices that are sure to please.

LADIES' JACKETS, to suit anybody's taste, and you can buy them at prices from 17.50 to 150.00.

MEN'S FUR COLLARS. Detachable collars for men are worn to a great extent these days. We have them in German Otter at 5.00, Wallaby at 4.00, Persian Lamb at 15.00, Beaver at 15.00, Neutria at 5.00. We attach them to the coat free of charge.

Our Fur Repairing Department is doing good work, and you will find that people who have taken advantage of this department, have been well satisfied with the result. Bring in your furs and have them made over or repaired. We guarantee satisfactory work.

How we have the finest Women's Neckwear and Belts.

We will tell you the reason. The Featherbone Novelty Mfg. Co., Ltd., are the strongest and largest makers of women's neckwear in Canada. They keep their designers in direct touch with Paris and New York. What's correct in style is quickly reproduced in Canada at about half the foreign price. They confine their entire line to us in Napanee. Novelties are sent on to us quickly. That's "how" we show exclusive collars week in and week out the year round. A big case of novelties just arrived. On display in our silent salesmen.

Choice for 25 Cents.

One main aisle floor is now decorated with about a thousand collars and belts at the popular price, 25 each.

BELTS—the best 25c, 50c and 75c kind we ever had. Fancy boxes provided for the better qualities when wanted for Xmas presents.

Table Covers.

When looking for gifts sometimes well to consider such useful lines as Table Covers. Sizes run, 1 yd. x 1 yd., 1 1/2 x 1 1/2, 2 yds. x 2 yds., 2 yds. x 2 1/2 yds. Made from Chenille, Tapestry and Repps, 50c to 5 00.

Boys' Sweaters.

Some merchants will tell you that there is not much sale for boys' sweaters. Probably they don't sell much. One thing we know is that we never sold as many sweaters—over 40 dozen already sold this year, and most of the winter to come yet. Our prices range from 39c up to 2.50 each. What nicer Christmas present could you give.

Two More Great Shopping Days—We are Splendidly Ready.

Robinson's is Napanee's Most Satisfactory Boys' Store.

You see we have always looked upon the boys' clothing as foundation building—looking ahead to the day when the boy customer would become the man customer. It has always been our rule to INSIST ON HAVING: Right in qualities, patterns and colorings. The goods that wear. Right making, especially in the hidden portions where careful tailoring counts for so much. Right styles. We never were satisfied with the easy going plan of thinking anything is good enough for a boy. We say only the best is good enough. Right prices—and nothing extra because Robinson's boys' clothing is the most stylish. Examine the stocks here. Why should other stores say "as good as Robinson's" unless the boys' clothing at Robinson's is best.

Holiday Handkerchiefs for Men.

The term "holiday handkerchiefs" means—at Robinson's—the widest variety and best obtainable values for the money. Itemized our handkerchief sales require to be expressed in big figures and that means that the power of big orders brings you lowest prices.

Fancy Bordered Excelsas - the best looking and most durable hdkf. for the money that is on the market, 5 for 25 cts.

Excelsas with Initials Embroidered—20c and 25c.

Silk Handkerchiefs—from 15c to 1.00 each.

Linen Handkerchiefs—from 15c to 25c each.

Lawn and Cotton, white, red and blue, at 5c, 10c, 15c and 20c.

A SPECIAL BARGAIN IN LAWN HANDKERCHIEFS.

We have about twenty dozen Linen Lawn Handkerchiefs, regular 10c value, men's full size, Sale Price, 5 cts. each.

The better qualities put up in nice fancy boxes if you wish.

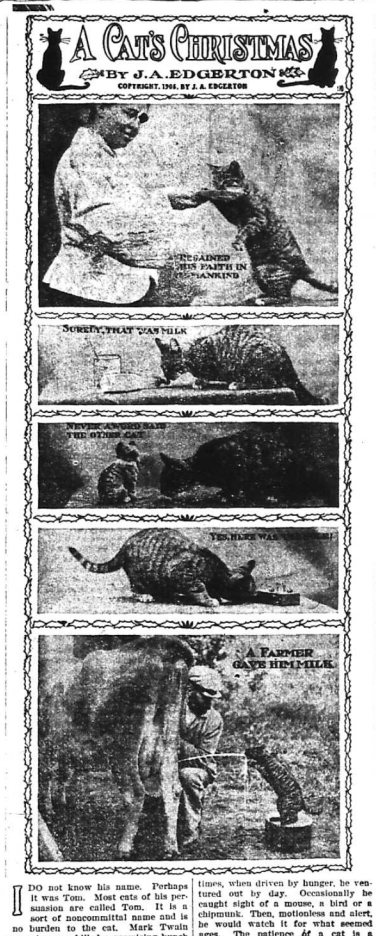
A CAT'S CHRISTMAS

By J. A. EDGERTON

COPYRIGHT, 1906, BY J. A. EDGERTON



DO not know his name. Perhaps it was Tom. Most cats of his persuasion are called Tom. It is a sort of noncommittal name and is no burden to the cat. Mark Twain says he once killed a promising bunch of cats by overloading them with names. He called them Zoroaster, Sour Mash, Apollinaris and Blatherskite. I once knew a cat named Plupey Shute, but he was fairly husky and did not seem to mind it. We might compromise by calling this especial feline Micawber. He was always looking for something. Mostly it was for something to eat, and when it wasn't that it was for trouble.

Micawber had had a hard life. What between the world, the flesh and the small boy he was up against it most of the time. As a kitten he had been reared in comparative luxury, but that time now seemed to him, when he thought of it at all, like a dim, sweet dream. Mostly he did not think of it, being too busy with everyday affairs, such as fighting, dodging stones and looking for provender. The family where he had lived in his happy youth had moved away, forgetting to take him along. The next occupants of the house did not want him, so he was thrown out on the cold world. He did not leave voluntarily, but after being chased out, kicked out, locked out and doused with hot water a sufficient number of times he finally took the hint that his company was not desired. He did not so much mind the indignities, but rude, physical assault pained and surprised him. There are some things that even a cat will not stand.

After that, for the most part, he lived in a back alley. He slept in a barrel by day and went on voyages of exploration and discovery by night. He did not find much but tribulation and scraps—scraps that were eatable and scraps with other fellows. Sometimes, when driven by hunger, he ventured out by day. Occasionally he caught sight of a mouse, a bird or a chipmunk. Then, motionless and alert, he would watch it for what seemed ages. The patience of a cat is a thing that should be immortalized in a monument. While on these daily outings he had to jump sideways and straight up to get out of the way of playful brickbats and clods hurled in his direction. He became as expert in dodging missiles as a millionaire in evading a court summons. Only Micawber knew nothing about millionaires. He belonged to the hoi polloi. Most of the time he lived the strenuous life. He became expert in war through many trouncings. He learned to lick everything he could not make love to. He had no morals to speak of and was never troubled by conscience or altruism. When living the simple life he was mild and meek looking and had a voice as gentle and pleading as that of a book agent. But when on the warpath he was a cyclone and emitted yells that would wake up the block. He was a bad man from the mountains and was yearning to make the world acquainted with the fact.

Now, there are cats and cats, as you doubtless know. Sometimes there are too many of them, especially at night. Micawber belonged to this overplus. The cat's voice when tuned up is not exactly like the music of the spheres, but attracts more attention. When excited by wrath feline language has a diabolic quality that sounds like blasphemy. So does the language of the man who is stirred out of his rest thereby. If some Garrick could discover just what feline sinful talk means he would doubtless bring to our notice an original and delicious array of swear words that would enrich the language.

Through long practice Micawber had developed a voice that ran all the gamut of hideousness. It scooted through all the scales of discord and embraced all the octaves of inharmony. It was not musical, but penetrating. It was chaotic, criminal and assault provoking. It expressed all that is fiendish and malevolent. It had in it the despair and terror of a lost soul, the wail of a defeated demon. It was a scandal, an outrage and an infamy. The steam siren got all its sliding scale of diabolism, all its crescendo of cussedness, all its switchbacks and shoot the chutes of the infernalism of sound from the feline voice.

Yet to regard Micawber's sleepy eyes, his inoffensive demeanor and his playful disposition one could not suspect him of harboring such sentiments. You would not imagine that under that fluffy and amiable exterior could be rolled up so much noise and depravity—on the outside, inoffensive and guileless docility; on the inside, murder, riot and vice. "Childlike and bland," like "the heathen Chinee," he had underneath a double portion of the spirit of Beelzebub. That is a cat. That was Micawber.

His life contained other forms of excitement. Once for a time he found a haven of refuge in a saloon. He did not learn to tipple, for that is a form of human delinquency that is beyond even a cat. He was regarded as the mascot of the place and grew as sleek and prosperous looking as the owner. One night the saloon blew up from a defective gas main. In removing the ruins the workmen unearthed one piece of debris that emitted a wild yell and shot out of the place like a streak. It was Micawber, denuded of hair, but very much alive. Many emotions were expressed in that yell—pain, rage, terror, hunger and the outraged sense that follows the betrayal of childlike faith. He had trusted and in return had had hurled at him a large section of earthquake and destruction. Out of peaceful sleep he had been hit by a house, hurled what seemed miles upward and had fallen back to be pinned down under a rain of broken bar fixtures, fragments of free lunches and smashed beer bottles, there to be imprisoned in the blackness of utter darkness for what seemed unending ages. What way was this to treat a defenseless and unsuspecting cat? What had he done to the world that it should blow him up and trample on him in such fashion?

In time, however, his wounded feelings and skin healed, his fur grew back and he was once more ready to make a presentable appearance in company. Even cats feel some delicacy about venturing into society with most of their clothes ripped off.

Still later in his career he was taken in by a large and matronly woman with an amiable disposition and a double chin. Here he regained his faith in humankind and ceased for a time to be a howling pessimist. Having had a little orifice cut for him into the kitchen entryway, this he wore slick with his frequent comings and goings. But some stray cats also learned of the hole, so a small door with hinges above was placed over the opening. This hurt Micawber's feelings, and he mewed piteously until one day the small boy of the house pushed him through the hole and showed him how the door worked. Ever afterward he asked nobody's assistance—that is, in going out. But when it came to getting back, that was a different matter. At first he pushed against the door, but this hurt his head and did not effect the desired result. Then he mewed. Finally he worked it out with his small cat brain. Lying on his back, he pawed the door open, then by a sudden squirming motion was through the hole before it could close again. After that achievement he arched his back and walked as proudly as though he had whipped the biggest Tom on the block. Nor did he forget the trick. Finally the family discovered him at it, and neighbors came to see his cleverness. If this excited his any pride, however, he never showed it. Cats are not afflicted with swelled head, even though they have no ethics worth mentioning.

When the family whom Micawber had honored with his presence moved away to a distant city it was with sincere regret that they were forced to leave him behind. As the house stood vacant for a time he again became a wanderer on the face of the earth, a tramp, a stray, a vagabond. So once more he began carousing and disturbing the neighborhood. He had a perennial appetite that never was appeased, a craving that never was filled. Micawber was a handsome cat and valiant withal, and among the alley script felines of all colors and no color to speak of he shone resplendent in a tabby coat, striped like a tiger. He had now reached an age when any well regulated cat should have settled down and become a respected citizen. Perhaps it was a sense of his unregenerate condition that caused him to cast about for another home. During his wanderings he stopped at a barn and a farmer gave him milk fresh from the cow. There were three dogs on the place, and Micawber did not stay.

One winter's day he especially felt the need of a new life. Perhaps it was because he was cold; also hungry. It seemed to him that he was always hungry. He was a bundle of appetite, an animated void, an incarnate longing. This particular day, which was to prove a red letter one in his career, he wandered far from his usual haunts. Finally espying a slightly open door, his old domestic habits got the best of him, and he ventured in. It was Christmas, but he knew nothing of that, being a pagan and heathen by nature. Perhaps in some subconscious way he was sent as a Christmas gift to the little folks there, but of that he also was in ignorance.

When once inside, the house seemed deserted, but it was warm. That was the main thing. No, not quite the main thing, for the inward gnawing continued. The carnal nature of a cat is as strong as that of some people. The only object in the universe now worth seeking was a dinner. Suddenly he caught an unmistakable scent that made his nerves tingle and his mouth water. Surely that was milk! Micawber's unerring instinct located it on a nearby table, and with a single spring he was there. But the best laid plans not only of mice and men, but also of cats, go oft astray. There was certainly milk here, but in such peculiar guise that his feline brain could not make it out. The nursing bottle was a new thing in his experience. He gave it up.

Next he espied another cat, one that looked like a very small edition of himself. It reminded him of his own days of kittenhood, when he had played with a ball and romped his way into the hearts of the children. He was not without sentiment, and, hungry as he was, he would stop to make friends. Leaping on to the table where the small cat was seated, he proceeded to make advances. But never a word said the other cat. He advanced closer, but the kitten did not even deign to notice him. This was rank discourtesy, and he went away in disgust. Stuffed cats were also a new thing to Micawber.

Venturing on his hunger driven way, he suddenly became rigid in every limb. He knew that odor. What cat does not? It was a mouse. But where?

Again his instinct directed him to the spot. It was on a table in the kitchen, and with a bound he was there. Yes, here was the hole—two of them, in fact. Placing his nose down in cat fashion, he discovered which hole the mouse used. Knowing nothing of the mysteries of traps and that this particular one had caught a small rodent only the night before, he sat down patiently to wait for that mouse to come forth. There the mistress found him when she returned from a hurried call to borrow some extra spoons for the Christmas dinner. Out of her large heart she took pity on the wandering feline, and he was rewarded with a liberal Christmas helping of his own. He was forthwith adopted and settled down to an old and respected cathood.

Only he was not called Micawber, but by the more appropriate, if more commonplace, name of Tabby. Of his former wanderings and adventures he told me himself as he purred out his content and gratitude at his new found home.

Mr. Arfur's Christmas Gift

By INA WRIGHT HANSON

[Copyright, 1905, by McClure, Phillips & Co.]

HENRIETTA, on the rug by the fireplace, was absorbed in her occupation, which was putting off all of Arminta Eudella's articles of wearing apparel and putting them on again. When the last tiny garment had been adjusted to her satisfaction she found time to look at Mr. Arfur, who sat by the window, a picture of doldrums. With a regretful glance at Evangeline Bell, who was yet to be attended to, the small mother arose and went over to Mr. Arfur. Resting one hand on his knee, she gazed anxiously into his face.

The young man roused himself and smiled down at the squeaky cut locks, the great brown eyes and dimples.

"Have you been bad, Mr. Arfur?" she inquired solemnly.

"I don't think I have been so bad as —the—bad man, Henrietta," he answered, squeezing her small hand.

"I've been good as an angel," she remarked modestly, "so Santa Claus is going to bring me anuver dolly in a tooling cab."

"In a what, Henrietta?"

"A tooling cab," she repeated; then, as Arthur failed to grasp her meaning, she exemplified patiently, "like Sister Wose's what she takes you widing in."

"Oh, I see! A touring car, you aristocratic baby. No more doll wagons and go-carts for you, eh?" he chuckled, then grew gloomy again.

"What do you want foh Kwismas?"

"Something I am afraid I can never have in all this wide world, Henrietta." He drew a long breath.

"If you are good, Santa Claus"—

"It's entirely out of the old fellow's jurisdiction, my pet."

The child gazed at him curiously.

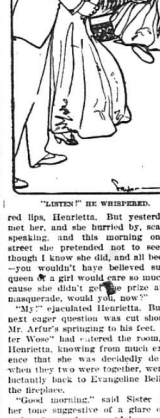
"It's a heart of fine gold that I want, Henrietta, and only one person can give it to me, and if she won't, girlie"—

"Is she a fairy?" Henrietta's tone was reverential, her eyes full of excitement.

"The queen of them all."

"And has a crown on?"

"Yes; a crown of her own golden hair, and her eyes are like brown velvet pansies, and she has the sweetest



"LISTEN!" HE WHISPERED.

red lips, Henrietta. But yesterday I met her, and she hurried by, scarcely speaking, and this morning on the street she pretended not to see me, though I know she did, and all because you wouldn't have believed such a queen of a girl would care so much because she didn't get the prize at the masquerade, would you, now?"

"My!" ejaculated Henrietta. But her next eager question was cut short by Mr. Arfur's springing to his feet. "Sister Wose" had entered the room, and Henrietta, knowing from much experience that she was decidedly de trop when they two were together, went reluctantly back to Evangeline Bell and the fireplace.

"Good morning," said Sister Rose, her tone suggestive of a glare of ice and a flurry of snow. "I have an engagement." But she sat down.

"Oh, I am sorry. Then I will go," he said gently, but he also sat down.

In his eyes, honest and gray, was a complexity of expressions as he watched her trying desperately to appear very much at her ease. Love looked from his eyes—there was no doubt of that—and admiration and approval, and yet a growing wonder that, after all, his idol could be so human.

"I am sorry that you are angry," he began when the silence was getting tense. "Try to realize my position, Rose. I sat there, an unwilling judge—my duty awarding prizes to the best sustained characters in the masquerade. Among the maskers was one to whom my heart went out—a slender little figure whose white satin gown, caught loosely around the waist with a silken girdle, fell in straight folds to her tiny feet. Crowning her small head were chrysanthemums, maroon and gold, and a line of the royal flowers reached from one sweet, bare shoulder to the hem of her gown. The chrysanthemum girl was the loveliest sight in the room, but she was not the best sustained character, so"—

"I hope you don't think I care because you awarded the prize to Grace Hereford," interposed the girl scornfully, "and please don't for a minute think I care—any—any—more. I am only disappointed in you." Her voice quivered a little.

"I have suspected the chrysanthemum girl of having moods," Arthur observed, looking at her reflectively. "A fellow I know has different names for her—Moonlight, White Rose, Laughing Water, Gentleness, Beauty, Wisdom. The fellow has admired her when she was gay and when she was serious, but I don't believe he has seen her when she was unreasonable."

The chrysanthemum girl sniffed.

"Will you kindly explain?" added Arthur.

"I had always been so proud of your strength of character," she began. "The first time I ever saw you was in a trolley car. You sat opposite me, and when the car turned the sun shone into your eyes. There was plenty of room on my side, where the sun wouldn't have annoyed you, but instead of changing your seat you got up and pulled down the curtain. I thought to myself, 'There is a man who will be master of circumstances, no matter what they are,' and"—

Rose stopped in confusion as she remembered other things she had thought about this finely formed, handsome young man.

"Go on," he said, leaning forward with great interest. "What else did you think?"

"And now to find out that you are nothing but a chameleon after all," she wailed.

"A what?" Arthur exclaimed in amazement.

"A chameleon," she repeated tearfully. "If you are on a brown leaf you're brown; if on a green tree then you're green."

"Well, green I acknowledge I am, for bless me if I can see what you are driving at."

"The other day when auntie was talking about the sin of wasting your time in dancing you said that you agreed with her that when there was work to do folks ought to do it. You said you were not going to the masquerade for that very reason."

"Well, I didn't intend"—

"You said you had several hours' work at the office that night. Then Grace Hereford came along and asked you to go, and you went!"

There was a flicker of amusement on Arthur's face which Rose did not see, being too busy winking back unwelcome tears.

"Miss Hereford had nothing to do with it, Rose," he said gently. "I went to work, as I said. About 9 o'clock Mr. Jones, the president, came in and said that if I could find Hasson and get his signature to a certain paper and get back by 11 o'clock he would make it worth my while. I had an idea that Hasson was managing that masquerade, and that's where I found him. He buttonholed me at once to be judge of the concern and wouldn't sign the paper unless I agreed. I saw I could get back by 11, so I stayed."

"And had plenty of time to dance with Miss Hereford," supplemented Rose sweetly, but unjudicially.

This time Arthur's smile was certain. "I looked for the chrysanthemum girl first and couldn't find her," he said truthfully. "I danced only once. But what made you think Miss Hereford asked me to go?"

"She said she would wager she could get you to go and that you would dance with her first, so I went to see if—I didn't think you would when you said you wouldn't, but"—

"I see," said the young man quietly. An inborn loyalty to womankind kept him from telling Rose that just as he had started away Miss Hereford had run to him, exclaiming that as he was so kind to award her the prize she certainly must reward him with the first dance, etc. With a sudden impulse he took Rose's little hand in his.

She sprang up and started for the fireplace, but he held her gently back. "Listen," he whispered.

On the glowing coals smoked Evangeline Bell, and on the rug, with eyes turned to the ceiling, knelt Henrietta.

"O God," she was saying, "now I lay me down to sleep. I give my precious dolly, so you will make the fairy queen wiv the cwown of her golden hair to loving Mr. Arfur the little benbit he wants for Kwismas. That's all, God, only please let me see her when she comes. Amen."

"Amen," echoed Arthur fervently.

"Grace Hereford has black hair," observed Rose inconsequently.

"She may have green hair for all it matters to me," said Arthur, with impoliteness. "Rose, darling"—

"I wonder if God will," Henrietta was murmuring with sad eyes fixed on the mound of ashes which was once Evangeline Bell.

Rose went over to the fireplace and kissed her small sister. "I think God will," she said reverently; then she went back to radiant Mr. Arfur.

Christmas For the Birds.

A traveler in Sweden tells of a beautiful Christmas custom in that land which, he says, could be imitated in many lands. He says: "One wintry afternoon at Christiansdale I had been skating on a pretty lake three miles from Gothenburg, on my way home I noticed that at every farmer's house there was erected in the middle of the courtyard a pole, to the top of which was bound a large full sheaf of grain. In answer to my question as to the meaning of it my companion replied: 'oh, that is for the birds—for the little wild birds. They must have a merry Christmas, too, you know.'"—Selected.

FARM HOME ATTRACTIONS.

The best investment that a farmer can make for his family is that which surrounds their youth with the rational delights of a bounteous and attractive home.

There is no money spent upon the farm that is so profitable as that which makes the wife and children fond and proud of their home.—Horace Greeley.

Santa's Christmas Mail

HIS sleigh and reindeer re-enforced by fast trains and ocean liners. Santa Claus is delivering a much larger number of presents every year. The United States postal authorities say the Christmas mail this season will far exceed in volume that of last winter. And then it was tremendous.

With every hamlet, town and city sending out and receiving its quota, millions of letters and packages—some by special delivery, many registered and others with ordinary postage—travel from and to all parts of the nation, arrive from foreign shores or pass out to them. There are about 80,000,000 persons in this country. A majority of them both send and receive Christmas mail, from one to several dozen pieces each. This gives a faint idea of the extent of the work that falls upon the postal authorities.

Whether in the heart of the city or on a rural delivery route the carrier is loaded down with gifts—remembrances of loving friends or heart echoes of scattered families. The letters he must deliver are easily three times as many as in ordinary seasons, but his greatest burden is the packages—innumerable, back breaking packages.

But if the carriers are worked hard, how about the postoffice clerks? Besides the increased amount of matter they have to handle, they must be particularly careful that the regulations of the department are not being violated. Many articles of merchandise are prohibited transmission in the mails. Violations are frequent because of ignorance.

One thing that causes extra work for the letter sorters is the peculiar addresses on many letters and packages. Aside from the thousands of missives sent to Santa Claus, there are those with some such address as "Care of Lieutenant Peary, North Pole." Pseudo addresses are not uncommon, and, although postoffice people enjoy them ordinarily, they do not at Christmas time. A frequent form of address is a drawing of a plum pudding, with the name, street and city written in minute characters on a leaf of a sprig of holly at the top.

The greatest center of postal activity in the world is probably—New York city. It is by far the largest mail distributing or shipping point on the continent, receiving postal matter from foreign countries, from the north, south and west. It also has an immense foreign population that sends home vast numbers of money orders and registered letters.

In the midst of the Christmas rush an average of 6,000 registered parcels and 60,000 letters an hour are received at the foreign mail station in New York. Recently one ship sailed for Europe with 3,000 sacks of ordinary mail matter and almost 75,000 registered packages, while another vessel carried away half a million dollars in money orders. D. W. SHE WAS RIGHT, AS USUAL.

Higgins Finds It Useless to Argue With His Wife.

Higgins is very fond of his wife, but sometimes they have little scrappy arguments, in which Higgins invariably comes out second best, though he hates to admit it even to himself.

Not long ago Higgins thought he had "got it on" Mrs. Higgins at last so surely that she wouldn't have the last word. He came home one evening with one eye all red and inflamed and not in the best humor on that account. Mrs. Higgins became all concern.

"What on earth is the matter with your eye, Henry?" she inquired sympathetically.

"Under," said Higgins shortly.

"Let me get it out for you."

"Already out."

"Well, let me put something on it."

"Don't need anything on it."

"Well, at least I'd bathe it in salt water."

"No; just let it alone, and it will get well of itself."

"Henry, do let me bathe it in salt water for your own sake, dear. Higgins, won't want any salt water on it, I tell you. The best thing to do for a sore eye is just to let it alone," said Higgins authoritatively.

The next day the eye was still inflamed, but Higgins resolutely declined to let any one "fool" with it. That afternoon he went down to the beach with a gay party of friends and disported himself with them in the surf, swimming and diving to his heart's content. At the breakfast table the next morning he noted with surprise that his eye no longer troubled him and seemed entirely well.

"You see now," he announced triumphantly to Mrs. Higgins, "my eye is cured already, and I didn't do a thing for it either."

"Yes, you did," returned Mrs. Higgins calmly. "You did exactly what I told you to do."

"I did nothing of the kind. I didn't touch it, and as a result my eye is already the same as ever. I tell you there's nothing like letting things alone."

"Didn't you go in the surf yesterday afternoon?" inquired Mrs. Higgins subtly.

"Yes. But what's that got to do with my eye?" said Higgins belligerently.

"Everything. The salt water cured it, just as I knew it would," ended Mrs. Higgins, with decision.

Higgins stalked from the room, banging the door behind him in disgust. His wife was right again, as usual.—New York Press.

The Sweetest Meat.

When Uncle Silas sat down to supper one evening his wife Chloe had a nice dish of savory fried chicken for him. The old man's eyes glistened and his mouth watered as he gazed fondly at the tempting viands, and he could scarcely wait to invoke the divine blessing. After an eager mouthful or two he looked over at his wife.

"Wha' yo' done git dis yer fowl, Chloe?" he asked confidently.

"I done buyed hit out uhen a wagon," she replied with honest satisfaction.

Still Bitter.

"Well," said he, anxious to patch up their quarrel of yesterday, "aren't you curious to know what's in this package?"

"Not very," replied the still belligerent wife indifferently.

"Well, it's something for the one I love best in all the world."

White Plague Vaccination.

Dr. Calmette, of the Lille branch of the Pasteur Institute, Paris, has communicated to the French Academy of Sciences, on behalf of himself and his colleague, Dr. Guerin, the results of important experiments foreshadowing the prevention of tuberculosis by vaccination. The form of tuberculosis treated is that of the digestive organs, which Dr. Calmette believes is extremely common in children. Drs. Calmette and Guerin believe that Dr. Behring's method of injecting virulent tuberculosis bacilli is dangerous, accordingly they render the germs incocuous by killing, or half killing, them with heat, and they are then administered intestinally as a preventive. The experiments thus far have been confined to calves and kids, but they have been so successful that their efficacy indicates the probability of equally effective results in human beings. They believe that infants can be rendered immune by a dose of properly prepared bacilli in milk a few days after birth and a second dose a few weeks later. It would be imperative to protect them for at least four months from natural tuberculosis infection, to which the treatment would render them particularly liable. Dr. Roux, of the Pasteur Institute, has been working independently in the same direction, and has obtained similar results.

A Story of the Pussy Willow.

Edith Baker, a little 10-year-old girl of Cobourg writes in The Globe: The pussy willows are found in swampy places. The branches of the pussy willows have little lumps on them. Early in the spring these little lumps begin to grow. After a while they look like little soft balls. The pussies grow larger and begin to peep out a little bit; then you see the little grey pussies peeping out. The pussies grow very fast after the buds come. They are a pretty grey color and feel soft and fuzzy, like a little grey kitten. The pussies each sit on a little seat that the buds made for them. We have some branches of pussy-willow, lilacs, horse-chestnuts and many other trees in glass jars in our schoolroom. We look at them every day to see how much they have grown. The buds open very quickly in the warm room. The horse-chestnut buds are very sticky. We have a branch from a currant bush that will soon have green leaves on it. We write stories every week to tell how our buds are growing.

The gentleman says that he was struck when in Toronto by the number of tall, fine looking young men. Many of them height was five feet eight, equal to the best in Great Britain.

Celebrations For Chamberlain.

Joseph Chamberlain, the English statesman, will celebrate his sixty-fourth birthday on the coming summer. On June 17 he will have completed 30 years of continuous representation of Birmingham in the House of Commons, and on July 8 he will reach his 70th birthday. The two events will be observed by the entire city, and the public demonstration will embrace as big a street parade as the honorable gentleman's friends can get up.

A Royal Xmas Present Maker

THE homemade Christmas present craze has invaded Russia, and the czarina has caught it. She has plenty of Christmas money and spends it liberally, but in addition makes with her own hands gifts that will especially please the czarowitz and the four little grand duchesses. The czarina's life is a busy one, filled with court and other public duties, social entertainments of a personal nature and many acts of charity, while she spends some time in painting, woodcarving, drawing and literary work. Also she devotes many hours to making Christmas presents for her children—an occupation which to her is indeed a labor of love.

Probably her most notable effort as a woodcarver is an exact model of a chalet in the imperial pleasure grounds connected with the Tsarskoe-Selo palace.

The original is the czar's favorite summer house, in which he frequently has his luncheon served when he desires to escape from the almost oppressive splendor of the imperial dining rooms—splendor that takes away the imperial appetite.

The model is exquisitely carved in whitewood and has eighty-four separate parts. These are so made that the miniature house can be pulled down by the czarowitz, who is now more than two years old, without being damaged. The czarina is an expert woodcarver. This ability is a result of her German blood and environment.

As a little Princess Alix, daughter of the late Grand Duke Louis IV. of Hesse and "sweet Princess Alice," Queen Victoria's favorite daughter, she was taught many of the crafts that it is deemed proper in Germany for all children to know. And it is because of that ability, her deep devotion to her children and the inherent desire of the Germans "to make things" that the czarina plans and executes little surprises for the five imperial youngsters of Russia.

Christmas Eve.

THERE is music in the chimney—
On the hearth a genial glow.
How the house is making ready
For old Santa Claus, I know,
And the tune the chimney 's singing
Is a merry roundelay:
"Jog and dance—
Christmas 's here,
And old Santa 's on the way."

EVERY spark that mounts the chimney
Is a fairy of the fire,
Dancing up to watch for Santa,
Sailing higher, higher, higher,
Till, amid the stars that twinkle,
On the sky pathway they pause,
Gaze and blink,
Nod and wink,
Waiting for old Santa Claus.

ALL the coals that glow and sparkle
On the hearth or in the grate
And the embers there assembled
Are but eager eyes that wait
For Kriss Kringle, who is coming
With his pack of sweets and toys,
Sledge and deer,
Bridge and steer
To a million girls and boys.

ARTHUR J. BURDICE.

An International Incident

A HOLIDAY celebration that will long be remembered in the American navy is the "Santa Claus dinner" given in the wardroom of one of Uncle Sam's gunboats of the Venezuelan squadron. The plan had been to have the affair on Christmas night, but as the vessel was then at sea the event was postponed until New Year's. It was on this occasion that an Italian battleship commander, with warlike intentions toward the United States and Germany, was completely beguiled into peaceful thoughts by good American punch, which the American officers dealt out to him in such generous quantity finally said he would like to settle in the western hemisphere.

It happened that the Italian's mission of war and the Venezuelan gunboat arrived in southern waters at about the same time. There was the usual interchange of courtesies. Then occurred the invitation that resulted in the Italian captain's fire. A South American newspaper printed a cartoon representing him as being blown out of the water by the United States gunboat. In this, of course, there was no sense whatever, as Italy and this country were on the friendliest terms, but the foreign skipper, being both excitable and suspicious, took the matter to heart. The Americans heard that he even accused them of inspiring the cartoon and that he had complained to his home government.

New Year's day came duo while the gossip was at its height. Early in the forenoon officers of the gunboat had been making preparations for a grand feast. They decided at the last minute to invite the Italian and his staff as guests of honor.

A refusal, of course, was out of the question, but when the visitors arrived their attitude was cold and distant, especially that of the captain, who looked as though he expected to be thrown into irons. It was said afterward that he had ordered his vessel to be ready for immediate action in case of treachery. At any rate, he sat down at dinner without a smile for his hosts, and for awhile things looked gloomy.

Gradually, however, the younger officers of the gunboat succeeded in forcing the visitors to partake of the punch, and with each glass the suspicious captain grew less suspicious. In an hour he was affable. In another hour he was affectionate. By the time the real celebration began, while the coffee was being served, he had forgotten the cartoon and was drinking healths to the stars and stripes every thirty seconds. When the ceremonies, which had been carefully arranged, had been in progress a few minutes he was proposing a joint expedition by he and the gunboat's crews against the Venezuelan capital.

"DRINKING HEALTHS TO HIS STARS AND STRIPES."

Even if the incident of the Italian's conversion had been lacking the dinner would have been an affair to be remembered. The first part of the closing celebration was the appearance of a Christmas tree, which of course should have been called a New Year's tree. It was a big tree, too, one that anybody might have envied, and the tars had made a trip ten miles inland to get it on the previous day. As it was borne in the wardroom it reached up into the dome-like window at the top. For this window, forming a sort of tower space in the wardroom, there was, in ove a technical name, but no landlubber could hope to get it right, so let it be called simply a window. It was in the way up, and from every branch there hung gifts for the merry diners.

Just as the New Year's tree was fastened into its place on the center of the table there appeared through the high window a real Santa Claus, with beard and fur and red coat of approved cut. Down the chimney-like opening he crawled, finally leaping upon the table with such force that half a dozen glasses went crashing to the floor. Amid the appalause of the now hilarious party he proceeded to award the presents, calling each name in a gruff voice from beneath his white whiskers. When he came to the Italian captain he addressed him as "Your most powerful excellency, Signor Capitan ——," by which high sounding appellation the signor captain was so flattered that he bowed until his forehead bumped into what was left of a saucer of ice cream.—New York Times.

A ROYAL POKER GAME.

How King Kalakaua Wound Up His New Year's Festivities.

C. R. Mackenzie, describing in the St. Louis Republic a New Year's day in old Honolulu, says:

"After dinner we adjourned to the royal library, where we found card tables already prepared. We generally wind up an evening of this kind with a game of poker,' said Kalakaua. 'Are you all content?' Every one was content, but it was my luck to be seated at the king's table.

"Next morning when at breakfast at the hotel one of the king's equerries came to my table and placed a diamond bag containing forty ten-dollar pieces in front of me, saying the king had sent them with his compliments. One of the ladies of our party who had witnessed this somewhat unusual proceeding asked me why the king should send me such a present.

"'Madam,' I replied, 'the shillings and sixpences which in the days of my youth I cast upon missionary waters to be wafted back to me across the Sandwich Islanders have this morning been returned to me a hundred fold.'"

Fortune Telling on New Year's Eve.

Fortune telling obtains in rural Germany on New Year's eve. The young people, who gather to peer together into the future, melt a little lead in a long handled ladle. The person who grasps the handle then pours the molten metal into a pail of water, standing well back so as not to be scalded by the splashing water and steam, for the striking of the lead upon the water produces almost the effect of an explosion. If the lead congeals into any shape that can be construed as like a star it is a good augury. If it film gathers on the surface it means money. Any old woman who is an expert seer can see in the metal and water sure signs of coming marriage, long journeys, sickness or death. The ability to read these riddles is supposed to descend by inheritance from mother to daughter.

Off Santa Claus' Beat

SUPPOSE there is a Santa Claus
That brings them pretty toys
An' candy an' mince pies an' things
To lots o' little boys.
But where we live down here, I guess,
Is sort of off his beat.
I'm pretty certain, anyway,
He never found our street.

He goes around to all the stores
An' fills 'em full o' things
Like sleds an' skates an' railroad cars,
The kind he always brings,
An' then he seems to lose the way
To our house. Ain't it queer
That all the times he's come to town
He's never been down here?

HE GOES AROUND TO ALL THE STORES AN FILLS 'EM FULL O' THINGS.

I admit my mother if I might Go wait for him uptown
An' tell him that the boys I know
Invites him to come down.
But she just sort o' chokes an' coughs,
An' then she looks away
An' says, "He'll find us out, I guess,
An' visit us some day."

An' yet I've been a-waitin' here
So long that I don't b'lieve
I ever see him come at all
On any Christmas eve.
I'm goin' to ask a p'liceman if
Santa he should meet
He'll just go up an' speak to him
An' point him out our street.

ON NEW YORK'S EAST SIDE.

How New Year's Day Is Celebrated In the Italian Colony.

The little boys and girls of Mulberry street, on New York's upper east side, keep their pockets, purses and savings banks ready for New Year's. This is their great day, whether or not the American Santa Claus put anything in their stockings on Christmas, their own uncles and aunts cannot get off without strenna for capo d'anno (New Year's gift). The strenna is confined to the children and to cash. It is to be distributed by the relatives and friends of the household on New Year's day, when calls and congratulations are in order.

"Buon capo d'anno!" ("A good head of the year!")

"Lo stesso a voi per cento anni!" ("The same to you for a hundred years!")

When the greetings are over the guests will be treated to vermicelli served with a special sort of sauce and salad and "merisons" prepared with oil and lemon juice. The thought of the New Year's viands makes the black eyed children smack their red lips, and their time is taken up with discussing it as well as with making forecasts as to how much of a strenna Uncle Sosad-so and Cousin So-and-so will put in the hat or little hand before leaving.

The old folks in Italy, too, are thinking gratefully of the great land beyond the seas over the wine and vermicelli which they have bought with American money. If strenna is here only given to children an exception is made for the old people at home, to whom a New Year's gift is sent three or four weeks in advance so as to teach its destination in time for the great religious and civil holiday. The Mulberry street bankers do a rushing business in capo d'anno remittances.—New York Herald.

THE NEW YEAR IN JAPAN.

The Day When the Mikado Has to Get Up at 5 o'Clock.

Quaint and curious New Year customs exist in Japan, where the 1st of January commences with a religious festival celebrated at 5 in the morning. At this time the mikado, dressed in Japanese costume, proceeds from the palace, followed by his deputies arrayed in ancient style and the foreign ambassadors in regalia dress. He enters a small building or temple, prostrates himself to the east, west, north and south and solemnly pray for the prosperity of the nation.

Later at a ceremonial breakfast the emperor and empress receive their family and court for three days, the rooms being thronged. At the expiration of that time the real year begins, and a formal luncheon is served from which each guest is expected to take a cup and saucer as a souvenir.

Among the people the earth and heaven are propitiated by offerings of rice and vegetables, and strips of red paper are pasted on the doors as a sign of good luck. This color is used exclusively save in cases where a death has occurred within a year, when blue paper is used instead of red. The day ends with people still saluting each other and attending the plays at the theaters, where gorgeous robes and monotonous voices are the distinguishing features.—New York World.

Little children there will please the old dears either at the table or on new Christmas tree by making as follows: Cut the cakes in little pairs with a small cutter. Spread a circle of tissue paper of white or any other color liked two inches larger than the cake, pink the edge with scissors and run a thread round one inch from the edge. Put a cake in the paper, draw up the thread, and a cunning little cap is formed. The pleasure of small children will well repay the trouble of making these little cake babies.—Pittsburg Press.

First Aid to Santa Claus.

A clever idea for a Christmas night party is to have the gifts come in on a sled piled high and strapped on and the sled drawn by two lads dubbed Santa Claus' assistants. The place cards at the supper would follow the distribution of the gifts should be tiny sleds made from cardboard and dipped in mucilage, then in diamond dust, the rope to be of red cord and each sled drawn by a miniature Santa Claus about three inches high.

The Children's Festival.

"And a little child shall lead them." The entire meaning of the festival of Christmas is contained in these words. It is the festival of the children because on this day God, the Son, the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity, took upon his human nature in the shape of a helpless and beautiful child. —Rev. John Talbott Smith, LL. D., President Catholic Summer School of America.

No More Wanted.

"Merry Christmas, old man! And many more like it."

The man addressed turns a baleful, sleepless eye upon the speaker and replies:

"Many more like it! Say, you hadn't heard that twins came to our house last night, had you?"—Judge.

"Jessie Christmas!"

Little Jessie woke up on Christmas morning and called to her four-year-old sister Mary:

"Merry Christmas!"

"Jessie Christmas!" promptly answered the baby.

Are There Others?

Christmas is coming
And Santa Claus, too,
And, being dead broke,
Lord, what shall I do!
The children will cry,
Their mother will pout—
I'll have to go try
Put my watch up the spout.

A Polite Way.

A little boy, with an interest in the meaning of unfamiliar words, said to his mother: "What is the meaning of 'civil?'" "Kind and polite," answered his mother. A puzzled look brooded for a moment over the boy's face. Then he said, "Was it a kind and polite war that was in this country once?"

The Jester.

He that will lose his friend for a jest deserves to die a beggar by the hangman's hand. Let thy jeste be that they may not grind the credit of thy friend, and make not jests so long that thou becomest one.

Placid and Contented.

"Mrs. Burnes Cache seems to have a placid and contented look."

"Undoubtedly she has," replied Miss Cayenne. "She knows how well her new gown becomes her."

I have somewhere seen it observed that we should make the same use of a book that the bee does of a flower. She steals sweets from it, but does not injure it.—Colton.

MATCHES ON MAIL BOXES.

The Scratcher May Afterward Get a Light on Poison Dose.

Mr. Smoker, see to it that your Uncle Samuel does not get you striking matches on the box of his mail boxes. He'll surely make trouble for you if he can prove that a certain scratch on the metal of one of the gray boxes in the corners was made by your drawing the tip of a lucifer across it.

That's about what the mail carriers told the fellow who is handing you this advice. It was given just after the adviser had stopped, feeling "smoky" after coming out of an office where they wouldn't let him puff the stogie he had in his pocket, to scratch a match on the mail box. He was rather surprised when the mail carrier coming up to unlock the box, said;

"Don't do that!"

"Why not?" he queried. "I've been doing it for years. It doesn't hurt the box. Other fellows and myself have scratched matches on the top of this mail box for years, and there is only a little extra patch on the metal to show for it."

"Well, go ahead if you want to," sighed the mail carrier. "But remember that if the Inspector sees you, up you go on a charge of defacing government property. And you know that if the inspector ever gets you it's you for scratching matches on the prison bars for a day or so. By-by."

How the Great Penguin Hatches.

It may interest you to know that the great penguin lays an enormous egg and sits standing with its head as high as a man's waist, hatches its eggs in a peculiar manner. These are not laid upon the ground and brooded on after the manner of most birds' eggs. The female lays two large eggs. The first she hands over to the male bird, the other she puts in her own place. She then holds the egg between the upper surface of the large flat feet, and is pushed up under the waistcoat of thick feathers. It is there held close to the body, whose warmth gradually vitalises the young bird. So tenacious are the parent birds of this grip that if you knock one of them over it will fall on its back with its feet stuck stiffly out, still clutching the egg to its body.

Little Johnny's Resolutions

NEXT Tuesday 'll be New Year's day,"
Said little Johnny Lake.
"Some resolutions, mom the dear,
I really ought to make.
Mom's promised to stop gossipin',
An' so has Sister Sue.
I guess I'll resolute a bit.
Let's see—what shall I do?

"I'll resolute, I guess, to quit
A-splittin' kindlin' wood;
Then pop 'll have to do that work,
Like fathers always should.
An' then, while I'm a-doin' it,
I'll resolute to quit
The Sunday school, 'fer goin' there
With me don't make no bit.

"I GUESS I'LL RESOLUTE A BIT."

"I'd like to resolute some way
To git myself a goat;
I want a buttin' billy ram
With whiskers on his throat.
An' then I'll resolute, I guess,
To beat up Tommy Hunt;
He's took an' stole my girl from me,
The doggone little runt!

"I reckon that's enough fer me
To resolute jist now;
At any rate, I'll make that do—
It's plenty, anyhow.
Let's see—I start on New Year's day.
Well, that ain't very fur.
Won't mom be tickled when she finds
How well I've minded her?"

New Year's on the Ganges.

To know whether one will outlive the year is almost universally regarded as a very desirable piece of knowledge, and to acquire it the men and women of different nations resort to various stratagems to compel fate to stand and deliver. The dweller by the Ganges lights a tiny rush candle and fixes it upright on a bit of board, while he launches one of the frail boats of the sacred stream. If it remains alight until he can count 777, the perfect number, he regards his prospects as good for the year. If it goes out the omen is unfavorable. He gives himself the benefit of expedition, too, for instead of counting in prosaic fashion—one, two, three, four—in the old slow style, he counts by leaps and bounds—five, ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty—and thus takes advantage of the flickering candle and fluctuating wave and increases his length of days by the glibness of his tongue.—Pittsburg Press.

Watching the Old Year Out.

Watching the old year out has been a common custom in many lands. In most countries it assumes with the serious minded the phase of devotion. In many countries where Roman Catholicism is the prevailing form of faith the year is begun with midnight masses. Among the Greek Catholics the same usage prevails. It declined in the Church of England, but was revived by several of the dissenting bodies, the watch night of the Methodists being merely a modification of the once general practice. Among the convivially inclined, however, watch night is taken anything but seriously, and the new year is welcomed with every sign of rejoicing as to one who did not understand the customs would seem to indicate that all men were heartily tired of existence and glad to see their years go by as speedily as possible.

First January New Year's Day.

Caesar selected the feast of Janus, the two faced god of war, as the year's great fille stone, because the statue of this god seemed to look both into the past and forward into the future; hence on New Year's day we are still paying tribute to a heathen god. Prior to the reform of the calendar the Romans observed the 21st day of December, the winter solstice, as the beginning of the year. This date and the summer solstice, the first of June, the vernal equinox and autrumnal equinoctial changes in March and September, have come in for first place in the year at various times in the history of the world.

New Year's Eve In Italy.

Don't you wish you were in Italy on New Year's Eve? Promptly at the stroke of 12 on New Year's eve there are rustling and bustling and merry laughter as each maiden kisses all the young men she can catch. It is the only moment in the year when custom permits her such a liberty, and she is not slow to take advantage of it. Then, the new year having made its bow, the party breaks up, the young folk take a walk, and the first person of the opposite sex which each rencontre will be considered destined to be that maiden's future partner in life.
